The international community has been generous in financial terms, but ultimately ineffective. Shamed by the blind eye that we turned to what happened under Mobutu because of the cold war, and doubly shamed by our inaction in the Rwandan genocide, we have since showered money on the DRC. Some $1.2 billion is spent annually financing the 17,000 UN troops in what is the most ambitious peacekeeping force in the UN's history. The DRC is now the top African recipient of UK aid. Soldiers from the Pakistani UN contingent, whom we met on the trip, were decent and brave, but they have a very limited mandate, and they often end up simply chasing the militia from one part of the country to another. That is a particularly sensitive issue in the Kivu region, where the Rwandan Hutu Interahamwe militia are being chased inland, further away from the border areas and, significantly, further away from Rwanda, to which everyone agrees they must return.

The most that can be said of MONUC is that it has succeeded in stabilising the situation and has made elections possible. That should not be underestimated, but what happens after the elections will be crucial. The model has to be what happened in Sierra Leone, where the UN was prepared to stay for three years after the election and where it made a commitment to train the local army for a full 10 years. Sierra Leone is a tiny country compared with the DRC, so the price will be huge, but if we want to stop the rapes, the extortion and the regional instability that affects not just the DRC but Sudan, Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi, we have no alternative.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: During my hon. Friend's visit, was he able to gauge at all whether the UN stabilisation force has been effective at reducing the number of forced child recruits in the various rebel armies? Does he think that that problem has been tackled at all?

Mr. Hunt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising an important point, to which I intend to return. The simple answer is that the UN has stabilised the situation, but we now have to persuade the child recruits who joined the militias to come back out of the bush, and determine whether the disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration process, under which the child recruits are demobilised and reintegrated back into the communities, is actually working. The international community seems to have devoted a lot of money to making that process happen, but when one actually looks at the DDR camps, there seems precious little evidence of that money on the ground, so he legitimately raises a concern about whether the policy is as effective as it should be.

Returning to the issue of the UN force, we have to recognise that a UN peacekeeping force can only ever deal with the symptoms of a problem, not the cause. Attacking the causes of the problem will involve much more fundamental action, including an international arms trade treaty, referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), and serious reform of the unpaid, untrained and undisciplined DRC army. We must consider whether some of the money spent on UN forces would be better spent on training that army. We must exert maximum pressure on the post-election regime to stamp out the corruption that filters off soldiers' salaries before they are received.

Given our substantial influence in Rwanda, we can do much more to help facilitate the return of the estimated 10,000 Interahamwe militia members, who terrorised the population of the DRC in a desperate attempt to avoid repatriation. We need an internationally agreed repatriation corridor, complete with credible, publicised amnesties for the majority of militia members who had no part in the 1994 genocide.

We all hope that the June elections come off successfully. Some 26 million people have registered to vote and there was overwhelming support for the new constitution. However, there are plenty of reasons for caution. Consider this: a Head of State gives in to pressure from the west for reform; he declares his country a multi-party state; the newspapers explode with new-found freedom; civil society, the military and politicians agree on a transition to democracy; nearly 400 political parties are formed. Am I talking about the DRC under Kabila in April 2006? No, that was Zaire under Mobutu in April 1990.

When we see pictures of that old kleptocrat shaking hands with President Kennedy in the 1960s, we are reminded that Mobutu was as credible to the west then as Kabila is now. We wish President Kabila well, especially if he wins the election, but we urge him to recognise that, when the time comes, it will not be the acquisition of power but the courage to hand it over peacefully that will place him in Africa's pantheon of respected leaders.

I conclude with a couple vignettes about the child soldiers whom I met in Congo. Rafiqu, aged 13, was driven by poverty to leave his family and join a militia called the Mudundu 40, a rebel group that later merged with the Mai-Mai militia. He learned how to use Kalashnikovs, mortars, M160s and rocket propelled grenades. In his three years as a rebel militia soldier, he was involved in four battles and he thinks he killed about 30 people. Four years later, he is undergoing rehabilitation in a camp run by the excellent organisation Save the Children.

Sadiq, a 12-year-old, woke up to find that militia had stormed into his house and were raping his sister. They then abducted her. In a perverted twist of logic, he joined the same militia to see whether he could get her back. On one occasion, he remembers his commander telling him to execute 10 men, which he did. Now he is undergoing rehabilitation in a Save the Children camp, where he says that for the first time he is in a community with people who care about his future.

Such children are starting their lives again. The DRC is starting its life again. It is not for us but for its people to solve their problems. However, when we find those all-too-rare people—whether they be former child soldiers, an about-to-be-elected President, people working in rape hospitals or young politicians in Kinshasa—with the vision, determination and courage to deal with the problems, we in the international community must do everything we can to give them the support that they need.

3.24 pm

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) and the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) for their valuable contributions and for the good humour with which they conducted themselves during our trip, which was very testing at times. I was grateful for their good humour and good nature throughout.

I add my thanks to the UK ambassador Andy Sparkes and to Jo Gauld, who accompanied us and helped arrange our trip, and I pay tribute to the DFID team in Kinshasa and to our ambassador in Rwanda. I echo the comments made about my friend and former colleague Oona King, who founded our group seven years ago. At 7 pm tonight, "Sky News" will feature some of the people whom we visited, particularly those at Panzi hospital.

Hon. Members need no explanation of the situation in the DRC. During the past eight years, the wars and actions of armed groups have brought people there to their knees. Access for humanitarian groups is restricted by a lack of security outside the main cities. In a recent report, the International Crisis Group estimated that 4 million people had died in the previous eight years of conflict. That means that about 1,200 have died every day in their villages, in the tea plantations and the bush—out of the range of the lenses of the UK and general western media.

We have seen a war waged through arms in the DRC, but now a second war is taking place, waged through HIV/AIDS. There is war also waged through the disruption of basic services and, as has been said, a culture of corruption at all levels, which means that soldiers who should be demilitarised are not paid. So they go back, take up arms and start the cycle of violence again.

I should like to touch on the Panzi hospital, which my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman mentioned. I shall give some numbers that reflect what is happening in South Kivu province. Last year, the hospital treated 3,500 rape victims, 1,000 more than in 2004 and 50 per cent. up on the numbers treated the previous year. There is evidence from South Kivu that after the explosion and violence of 2004, things calmed and tailed off. However, things are escalating again.

An estimated 10 women are raped there every day. As we heard, the rapes are carried out with violence—with the use of knives, bayonets or bullets. The victims are sent back to their communities as cripples and outcasts. We received a report entitled "Women's Bodies as Battlefields" from one of the non-governmental organisations in the DRC. It sums up better than any of us could how women are used in the ongoing war.

The militias' aim is to degrade society by degrading women and its values. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that 45,000 women and girls have been victims of sexual violence in the DRC. The international community needs to ensure that each individual, hidden, private sexual tragedy becomes a collective and public human responsibility. One NGO worker told us, "We do not want homes for raped women or orphanages for children born of rape. We want those women to go back to their villages and be reunited with their husbands and for their villages to take collective responsibility for them. We want those children to have the right to grow up and go to school like any other child and not to bear for the rest of their lives the stigma of the unfortunate way in which they were conceived."

The women at Panzi have often been carried over non-existent roads—sometimes by their grandmothers, on piggyback—to seek treatment. My hon. Friend mentioned the incredible work done by Dr. Denis Mukaweye, who runs the hospital on a shoestring. I am glad to be able to tell the Minister that DFID is constructing a new building there. That is wonderful. It will mean that the women who are in for continuous operations will have to wait less time before they go back to their villages.

We heard the story of a woman aged 72 who had been raped in front of her sons-in-law. She refused all treatment and chose to die, rather than return home to the shame that she felt had been visited on her and her family. We heard stories of women abducted by the Interahamwe, gang raped every night, left pregnant with their rapists' babies. How can a mother be taught to love a baby from a man who has used such terrible violence on her? Many girls know that they and their babies will be rejected and even killed if they return to their villages, so they are left with no choice but to stay in the camps. In all the conversations about the programme to disarm, demobilise and reintegrate soldiers, scant attention was paid to the fact that few of those young women, while not formal combatants, have been successfully demobilised and reintegrated. It is difficult to talk about these terrible stories, but it is important that our group visited such people. We heard the stories and saw what was happening. It is important that things are put on the record.

The children of the DRC have no social and legal protection. The social pathologies of the violence, abuse and rejection of children are generalised across its society and go unpunished. The sexual abuse and rape of children is widespread. We must be aware, and be wary of, just examining what hits the western papers and is trendy in the international aid community at any given point, whether that be children accused of witchcraft or child soldiers. Such problems are huge and endemic, but they also stem from the situation of children and their having no legal and social protection.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): As one of the joint chairs of the all-party group on street children, I, together with two colleagues, will visit the DRC later this year, once the elections have been held. Will my hon. Friend detail the dispersal that happens there? How much does it compound the whole problem and the difficulties in which children find themselves?

Mary Creagh: I thank my hon. Friend for that useful question. Before we left for the DRC we had a briefing about the demobilisation and demilitarisation. In general, a series of armies travel with their women, children and families. They are sometimes transported thousands of miles to be demilitarised in one place and are then put back into a brigade in another place. I am unsure about the situation of children being demilitarised and demobilised, and I shall be interested to hear what he finds out.

There is a problem of women sometimes being left thousands of miles away from their partners and ending up in new camps. We visited camp Saio in Bukavu. It is not like a military camp as we in the west would imagine one; there are bunches of chickens hanging around and cabbages growing, because people have no food or money. They live on $10 a month if they are lucky—if they receive it. While their men are away being demobilised those women and children have no money on which to survive. There are problems with the men and their families in the demobilisation campaign and the payment of their wages. As the hon. Member for South-West Surrey said, it is clear that the money simply is not getting through.

One in five children in the DRC will die before their fifth birthday. We visited a Batwa pygmy village, where the children looked like they had chicken pox because they had so many spots on their heads. I asked what was wrong with one of the babies and the interpreter told me that I was looking at mosquito bites. The babies had so many bites because the mothers were sleeping out with them under the tea plantations every night, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned. We cannot imagine what it must be like to sleep in the rain with a tiny baby. Development or progress will happen only when such children and their parents have the security to sleep in their beds, when we can provide them with bed nets and when they can receive the education that they so desperately want.

We visited Mbuji-Mayi in Katanga province, where three years ago it was estimated that 5,000 children were living on the streets. People are currently trying to ascertain how many street children there are in Mbuji-Mayi itself. Some 80 per cent. of them have been accused of witchcraft. We visited a centre run by Save the Children, which aims to reunite those children with their families, and to give them a roof over their heads, something to eat and somewhere to wash. Our first sight on arriving at the centre was of 40 naked boys. I took a picture, which I probably would not have been permitted to do had I been in the UK. It was one of the few moments of light relief—all these naughty boys squirting each other and dancing around for us in the puddles.

It is important to put the accusations of witchcraft into the social and economic context in which they occur. There is no slack in families any more, because of the years of disruption caused by the war and the poverty of families. People are unable to feed the children. Some children have been tortured in order to be exorcised; they suffer all sorts of violence. We heard one story of a 16-year-old girl who was beaten to death by her father for being a witch. I was impressed by some of the leaflets that have been produced—I have copies, should colleagues like to look at them—which try to educate the local population that every family can suffer bad luck and unemployment and that a child who sleepwalks or who has epilepsy is a normal child, not a witch.

I conclude with a few remarks about the hopes for the DRC. We all hope that the elections scheduled for early July will represent a new dawn, but they are unlikely to be either elegant or flawless. I hope that they will be good enough to convince the DRC's citizens and the international donors that the first step on the path to a better future has been taken. I want the UK Government to play an active political role in the great lakes region to ensure the repatriation of armed foreign groups, whether we are talking about the Lord's Resistance Army or Interahamwe. We also have a role to play in Kinshasa in ensuring better aid co-ordination between the many countries that offer goodwill and are working there to improve people's lives.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I want the UN to remain in the DRC to provide long-term protection for the civilian population. We should extend the UN's mandate to training the FARDC, which is currently being done informally. I want it put on a formal footing. In addition, as the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) said, an international small arms treaty to end the traffic in small arms is vital.

I want our Government to work with that of the DRC to end the culture of violence with impunity, to instigate rape laws to punish those who currently engage in sexual violence with complete impunity, and to work on the better management of resource exploitation through the mining code, the forestry code and western companies. The DRC needs to abolish the death penalty to give some comfort to the people who have committed such atrocities that they will at least be guaranteed the right to life. The new Government need to think carefully about the quick wins that they will have.

I look forward to working with politicians in all parts of the House to ensure that the DRC is at the heart of all our parties' political policy development over the next 20 years, rather than just over the next 10 or five. I look forward to working with civil society and the Churches in the DRC to provide basic services and ensure that people can sleep in their beds at night.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): I thank the hon. Lady for that excellent and moving contribution.

3.37 pm

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) on securing this timely debate. No nation is more worthy of a debate in this House than the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The debate could not be more timely, given that we are approaching the first democratic elections there for 46 years.

I do not think that there is any disagreement that the DRC has been dealt an appalling historical hand. The recent history of that part of Africa is among the most desperate of any region. The various conflicts that have so tragically gripped that huge nation for the past 10 years are without precedent or peer. Some 4 million people—more than the entire population of Wales—have perished during the various conflicts. More people have been killed in the conflicts in the DRC than in any other conflict since the second world war. Given carnage on that scale, one would think that the headlines would be screaming about what is happening in the DRC, yet the conflict goes relatively unnoticed and unreported, and still it continues.

We have heard some harrowing details from members of the all-party group that visited the DRC recently. Children have been betrayed of their childhood by being forced to serve in the various militias. It is estimated that 300,000 children have served at one time in some of the competing militias, and children as young as seven have been forced to carry arms. We have learned that in parts of the east of the country children comprise as much as 40 per cent. of the militias.

There is no point in going over the political history of the DRC. That depressing and sad tale is familiar to everyone in this Chamber: the brutal, extractive colonial regime, and the bizarre and disastrous Mobutu years, which were followed by the DRC being plunged into a de facto civil war. What is particularly reprehensible is the behaviour of some of the DRC's near neighbours, which for years have taken advantage of the perilous conditions in that country and intervened for purely selfish reasons.

The DRC has not even started to sort out its many difficulties and challenges, but the elections are the best chance that the country has to secure a reputable future and the stakes could not be higher. If it has successful elections, it could have a bright and rosy future. The DRC is the third largest county in Africa and the fourth most populous. It is endowed with fantastic natural resources and should be able to sustain not only itself but the whole central African region. It seems that, perversely, the DRC has suffered most grievously for being in possession of natural resources and wealth, as all manner of people, from colonial rulers to voracious neighbours and corrupt rulers, have sought to acquire some of its wealth for themselves. It is as if the DRC won some great natural lottery but has never been able to cash in the winning ticket.

I visited the DRC last year, but not with the all-party group. I wish I had been able to join colleagues on that trip, as it sounded fascinating. I went with the Westminster Foundation for Democracy to Lubumbashi in Katanga province. Katanga province is at the heart of mining country, which was the engine that drove most of the DRC in the past 30 years. I visited the famous Jacobins mines, which were so famously looted by Mobutu, and saw the first signs of the green shoots of recovery. Foreign investment has started to go into Katanga, which means that some of the dilapidated mines are starting to roll back into production. I hope to see further progress when I visit again this summer.

I found people who were looking forward to a new democratic era with a great deal of excitement, but others who have been thoroughly disappointed in the political process over the past few decades. They have been let down by successive politicians and therefore feel great anxiety and apprehension about the next few months and years, but the Congolese have so much to gain from a new democratic republic. The DRC is at a crossroads: if the process is successful, it will have an opportunity to catalyse the whole of the greater region of central Africa, if not of the whole of the continent. Politically, a new DRC with a normal political life could assist the progress of democracy throughout central Africa. Economically, the reconstruction of a country that is bigger than western Europe and endowed with incredible natural resources and mineral wealth could serve as an indispensable engine to drive the whole of the central African region, if not the whole continent. Culturally, a dynamic and vibrant DRC, with its fantastic music and incredible and unique history and culture, situated as it is right at the heart of Africa—between north and south, east and west—could act as a catalyst for all of African culture, including arts, science and technology, and in all its diversity could communicate that to the rest of the world.

That is what is at stake for the DRC. Economically and culturally, it could start a new African renaissance. However, that is dependent on several factors. Probably the two most important are a fair and free election that is seen as such, and an end to the fighting and interventions from near neighbours. There is no doubt that the elections will be an immensely complex task for the new Independent Electoral Commission. The registration process alone has been tortuous, and the election timetable has rightly been delayed because of logistical and communication difficulties in assuring that everybody in that huge nation has been registered.

As we heard from other speakers, the country has seen the usual political posturing before the election by some political protagonists. It is disappointing that some of the main contenders for the election have chosen not to register as presidential candidates and that there are fewer candidates registered for election to the legislature than there are seats in it. The latter may be the result of communications difficulties in that huge country, but, more seriously, it may show that some individuals and political parties are dangerously suspicious of the electoral process and of each other. I ask the Minister what he is doing further to engender confidence among the political parties and protagonists so that they can feel confident about participating in the election.

The international community has been positively engaged in ensuring that the elections are conducted fairly and freely. As we have heard, the United Nations has its biggest deployment of resources in the DRC and has been instrumental in trying to persuade rival militias to lay down their arms and be repatriated to their home nations. Over the Easter recess, I was in New York and popped in to see some officials in the United Nations. The most obvious sign of its work in the Congo are the blue beret soldiers, but a swathe of activity in respect of relief, development issues and local economic regeneration goes on underneath the surface. I welcome the EU's decision to send the German-led European Union force to assist MONUC during the election. Will the Minister say something about British participation in that force and whether the UK Government will do everything possible to ensure that the mission is a success?

I also welcome the new package from the Department for International Development. The UK may now be the biggest bilateral donor to the DRC. That is to be welcomed on both sides of the House, and I hope that the Government will be encouraged to do much more. Perhaps the Minister can tell us whether aid is getting through to the hardest pressed parts of the country and what the UK Government are doing to support the many NGOs that are active in that huge nation. During my visit to the DRC, particularly in Katanga and Lubumbashi, I noticed the almost total lack of civil society. Will the Minister say what we are doing to help to build capacity within civil society, as that will be crucial in the post-election period?

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Order. Mr. Wishart, I am sorry to interrupt you, but may I ask you to be a bit generous? There is one more Member to speak, so will you bear that in mind?

Pete Wishart: Absolutely, Mr. Hancock. I shall conclude my remarks.

What will the UK Government do to discourage near neighbours from becoming involved in skirmishes in the DRC? It is not as if we are without influence in the area, particularly in Uganda and the other Commonwealth nations. I urge the UK Government to do all that they can to encourage greater co-operation between all the partners in the central African lakes region, and to ensure that the shared ambitions and agenda for the area are addressed.

Most importantly, what are the UK Government doing to ensure that there will be free and fair elections, and will there be assistance in the post-election period? No election in Africa has gone uncontested by the losing opposition, so we have no right to expect that this one will be any different.

Lastly, can we ensure that after the election it will be the Congolese who get their hands on the mineral wealth and the natural resources of their country? That will be very important—a key issue—as the DRC enters the post-election period.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): I call Jeremy Corbyn. I am sorry, Mr. Wills, you have no chance.

3.47 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Hancock, for the fair way in which you are chairing this debate. I thank my hon. Friends the Members for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) and for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) and the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) for the report of their harrowing experience.

We must consider the history and the victims of the DRC. I believe that I am the only Member in this Chamber who has a substantial Congolese community in their constituency. The community that I have the honour to represent dates back to the 1960s, when Patrice Lumumba's family first arrived in the Finsbury park area of Islington. They have been there ever since, and there is a substantial Congolese community as a result.

A local church, St. Mellitus, and its excellent priest Father David Ardagh-Walter, actively work with the community. The church has services in Lingala and in many other ways gives wonderful support to distressed people in the community. I put on the record my appreciation of them.

I have not had the good fortune to visit the DRC—I hope that I will in the not-too-distant future—although I have visited Rwanda and Angola. I had an experience that does not in any sense compare with that of my colleagues, but it involved an interesting point of history. I visited the Royal Museum of Central Africa in Brussels, which was constructed by Leopold. On one level, it is a bizarre and absurd folly, but at another level it shows the lunacy of the Belgian policy in the Congo from the mid-19th century onwards and the way in which Leopold manipulated the Congress of Berlin to get exactly what he wanted, which was the private ownership of the Congo. Human rights abuses have gone on ever since. Indeed, there were many reports of human rights abuses at the turn of the century. Roger Casement, a British diplomatic representative, exposed many of them. Sadly, he was later executed for his part in the Easter rising, but he is fondly remembered in Islington for his work in helping to bring about Irish independence.

The intensity of media coverage of conflicts around the world is a distorting prism. It used to be said that a war was serious if it was happening, but that it was very serious if Kate Adie was there—it had to be taken notice of. We now have 24-hour news running on cable channels all over the world, but if I were to step outside this room, stop 10 people in the street and ask them where is the worst conflict in the world, they would talk about Iraq and Afghanistan, and perhaps Colombia; I would be very surprised if anybody mentioned the DRC, or, indeed, any conflict in Africa. I am not minimising the effect of those other conflicts, but at least 3 million people have died in recent years in the DRC. The deaths, violence and abductions continue. A first world war rate of slaughter is happening in one of the largest countries in Africa with the largest mineral resources available anywhere.

It is clear that the intrusion in DRC affairs by forces from Angola, Zimbabwe, Rwanda, Uganda and several other countries over the years has not helped the situation, but made it made it much worse. The Lusaka accords allowed an opportunity to withdraw those forces, and in many cases the formal armies were withdrawn, but I am far from convinced that informal support is not being given to forces in eastern DRC by neighbouring countries and Governments. We should be very cautious about those countries' protestations of innocence.

On immigration matters, Committee Room 14 hosted a meeting of hundreds of Congolese people who were terrified of being returned to DRC. I hope that the British Government will no longer return people to DRC, but recognise that the situation there is incredibly dangerous.

Several speakers mentioned street children. Unless we do something to support street children—the victims of war—by giving them hope, education and housing, they will become the terror gangs, criminals and fighters of tomorrow. They know no other course.

Finally, we must consider what the international mineral companies are doing and where coltan, diamonds, gold and all other minerals are coming from. The Congolese people see nothing of those minerals, neither their benefits nor their profits, but because of them, they see environmental destruction, conflict and the arming of illicit groups. There are people in this very city who have made an awful lot of money out of the death and destruction in DRC, and they, too, should be brought to book.

3.53 pm

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) for securing this debate. I pay tribute also to his colleagues, the hon. Members for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) and for Wakefield (Mary Creagh), for describing during the first part of this debate their informative and moving journey to the heart of darkness.

When the hon. Member for South-West Surrey talked about security being the root of all requirements for the people of the DRC, I wrote "stability" on a piece of paper in front of me. I shall discuss four strands of that stability, and it will be interesting to hear the Minister's comments on them.

My first point is about political stability and the forthcoming elections. It is ironic that the country is called the Democratic Republic of Congo. The jury is emphatically out on whether it is democratic, and we shall no doubt find out in due course. Although elections are important and a precursor to achieving stability in most countries, they are not always a solution in themselves, as we have learned to our cost in Africa and elsewhere many times before. The elections are necessary, but I hope that we regard them as the start rather than the conclusion of a process. They are a milestone on a journey, but we should not assume that the elections in themselves will achieve the social outcomes that we want.

My second point is about funding and the financial contribution of the international community. In a spirit of bipartisanship, I pay tribute to the British Government for their general enlightened attitude to the DRC and other countries. Among advanced and prosperous western countries, through troops and other means, Britain is seen as taking a lead in putting in place aid and measures that support the stability of a country. I only urge the Government to continue to think imaginatively about how they can lead that process. I do not think that anybody present thinks that the solution to the ills of the DRC lies entirely in increasing the volume of aid that richer western European countries provide; none the less, using money intelligently and in places where it can have the maximum impact is important. The Government must continue to pursue that course.

My third point is about the economy. I differ slightly from the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on this matter. The DRC is blessed with a potential source of wealth. No country can succeed unless it is able to create prosperity for its citizens, so I completely agree with the hon. Gentleman that that the wealth must be structured so that it finds its way to the people of that country. However, international companies, including experts based in this city, have a role to play in ensuring that mineral resources and other infrastructure, including transport, are organised so that they can bring maximum benefit to the people of that country. Far from thinking that there is a potential conflict between western involvement and the prosperity of the Congolese, I think that there is potential for a harmonious synergy that would benefit them.

My final point about the four strands of stability relates to civil structures. We have already heard from the hon. Members for Buckingham (John Bercow) and for Wakefield about the need to reduce the number of arms available in the DRC, to pay soldiers so that it is in their financial interest to remain attached rather than detached from formal structures, and to integrate militias formally into an overall national force, which is a difficult process. When creating those civil structures, it is essential to reduce corruption in the public and private sectors, so that people have confidence in the institutions that exist to serve them.

In conclusion, on behalf of my party, I pay tribute to the Government for the work that they are doing and have done. I hope that the Minister can make further progress on the four areas that I have described this afternoon.

3.58 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I am delighted to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Hancock, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) on having raised a very important debate. The moving speeches made by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) and the hon. Members for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) and for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) have enabled us to understand the dramatic and traumatic effect that the horrendous conditions they witnessed had on them. We appreciate the way in which they were able to express that in the debate. Never having visited the DRC, I cannot replicate that, but I can bring something to this debate by putting some pressure on the Government and requesting information from the Minister. We look forward to what he has to say.

When I started my preparation for this debate, I did as I always do and looked at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office country profile for the DRC. It says:

"The DRC is ranked near the bottom, 168 out of 177 countries, on the Human Development Index. All the socio-economic indicators are poor, made worse by the last 10 years of war. The education system is in a state of collapse, and the public health system is reportedly a disaster. In December 2002, donors pledged some US$2.5 billion for reconstruction."

I shall return to that amount, because it is a huge figure. The profile continues with a description of what is happening today:

"The UK has been part of the international community's efforts to address basic humanitarian needs in the DRC. Britain has provided support for DDR (demobilisation, disarmament and re-integration) of the various armed groups and funded quick-start programmes to provide health and education to war-affected parts of the country. The UK increased its assistance to help rebuild the country to £40 million pa in 2004/05 and 2005/06."

That is a recognition by the Government of the dreadful state of that country.

As a number of hon. Members have mentioned, the DRC is well endowed with minerals. It has diamonds—at one stage it was the fourth largest producer of industrial diamonds in the world—gold, coltan, which the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) mentioned, and cassiterite. Its forest cover is abundant and rich, if it is sustainably managed, and there are rich agricultural lands. However, as is true of so many other African countries, the DRC's economy needs to be managed properly and to start producing if its dependence on aid is to be reduced.

Surprisingly, I entirely endorse what the hon. Member for Islington, North said about exploitation. It is clear that there has been exploitation by the mining companies, in part because mining takes place in conflict areas. Much of what is produced is smuggled out of the country by the various militias, with not even a penny benefiting DRC's economy. However, exploitation has also taken place because DRC has not had the resources to police mining properly. All such problems require western aid, help and advice to be rectified. If the country could rectify those problems, it could start on the path to prosperity. As the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire mentioned, some foreign aid is beginning to flow into the country. We must ensure that that transition is sustainable and that it benefits the economy of DRC.

One the tragic things that I learned in preparation for this debate—we have not heard much about it today—is that the habitat of lowland gorillas, which were never particularly numerous, is now so damaged that their number has been reduced to a mere 3,000. Human rights must always be paramount, but let us hope also that one of the things that comes out of the election is a reversal of that environmental damage.

As has been said, the DRC is Africa's second largest economy south of the Sahara. It has 56 million people, 56 per cent. of whom are Christian. The DRC held a successful referendum in December 2005. If that is an indication of what might happen in the election in June 2006, it bodes well. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey said that 26 million people had already registered for those elections, which is a positive sign. If we can build on that by working with the 16,000 or so members of the UN peacekeeping force who are already in the country and encouraging the European Union not to place its 1,200 to 1,500 troops outside the country in case of an emergency, but instead put them inside the country to prevent potential abuses in the election, that would also be helpful.

What else is to be done? The World Bank has produced a huge package of $2.9 billion of aid ahead of the elections, but with strings attached. The Opposition will vigorously hold the Government to account on how that aid is spent and what improvements it will bring. In too many African countries we spend millions of pounds in aid, yet the people are getting poorer. Gross domestic product in the DRC fell from $380 per person in 1960 to $115 per person in 2004, and 80 per cent. of the people still live on less than $1 a day. There is absolute evidence from other African countries that millions of dollars of aid are being put in, but people's standard of living is falling. Uganda is a case in point: in the past four years, the proportion of people living on less than $1 a day has increased from 30 per cent. of the population to 40 per cent., yet millions of pounds worth of aid has been put into the country. We have to get a bit clever about using aid—we must set specific targets and make further aid dependent on their being reached.

John Bercow: Although we do not want to live in the past, is it not important that people should not enjoy impunity for offences committed in the past? On that principle, and in light of the fact that the alleged founder and leader of the Union of Congolese Patriots was arrested and transferred to the auspices of the International Criminal Court in March this year, does my hon. Friend agree that it is extremely important to send out a message that actions have consequences and that further referrals of Government and Opposition leaders in the DRC will therefore inevitably be required?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I was going to refer to the international arrest warrants that my hon. Friend mentions. It is extremely important that there is a good likelihood that those who have committed atrocities will be arrested and punished by the international authorities. We can learn from our experience in other parts of the world. Atrocities have clearly taken place on a massive scale in the DRC.

I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion because I want to give the Minister plenty of time to tell us what the Government are going to do about the dreadful situation in the DRC, but I should like to concentrate on the elections for a moment. Let us hope that the 16,000 peacekeepers can be deployed to ensure free and fair elections. There is quite good press coverage in the DRC at present. Let us hope that the press can operate freely and fairly during the elections, so that we and the citizens of the DRC can be thoroughly informed of what is going on in them.

Following the elections—which, as has been said, will be quite inclusive—the rule of law needs to be properly established. One of the worst things that that we have heard about during the debate is the treatment of children, not only their forcible recruitment into the various militias, but the lives of street children who have to live other than in their own homes at night and who can be picked up, taken to police stations and tortured there. There are many similar child-related issues—sorcery has already been mentioned. Perhaps the most tragic thing in the world is human rights abuses against children, because they are even more defenceless than some adults. All of us—particularly the Government through aid and the NGOs—have a great deal of work to do to help street children.

One issue that has not been mentioned is the number of people in prison. Often, a prison sentence in the DRC is a death sentence. The prisons are overfull and people are there without proper trial. Following the elections, we will be looking for re-establishment of the rule of law, a proper justice system and a proper penal system.

This has been an illuminating debate. The Government can do a great deal. Other colleagues have said that we should put pressure on the DRC's neighbours, Rwanda and Uganda, which are after all friends and allies of ours, to sort out their militias. That will not be easy, particularly given the situation in Uganda with the Lord's Resistance Army. However, I cannot understand why the world has stood by and let the Lord's Resistance Army operate in the way that it has, particularly with the recruitment of child soldiers. We look forward very much to what the Minister has to say about DRC. No doubt he will bring a great solution to that dreadfully afflicted country.

4.8 pm

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) on securing today's debate. I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss such an important topic, and I acknowledge the excellent contributions to the debate.

I have only a limited amount of time, but I should like to welcome the all-party group's commitment to the great lakes region, its recent visit and the information that its members have shared today. I thank our former colleague Oona King for her work and acknowledge the thanks of hon. Members who participated in the recent visit for the work of our ambassador and staff in the DRC and Rwanda, including DFID staff.

The Democratic Republic of Congo has reached a critical moment. Success or failure over the next few weeks and months will have a wide-reaching impact. The 60 million people of the DRC have suffered enough. They want to see an end to the years of autocratic rule, conflict and destruction. We have heard figures this afternoon, and I confirm that the Government fully appreciate the scale of the problems in the DRC. About 80 per cent. of the population live in abject poverty on less than $1 a day. The latest UN figures put the number of internally displaced people at 1.5 million—the result of continuing violence, mainly in the east. There is a long way to go before we can give the Congolese population the stable, secure and prosperous future that they deserve.

What needs to be done? Free and fair elections will form the first step towards democratic and accountable government. Secondly, the new Government must be representative of the full range of Congolese interest groups and accountable to the people who elected them. All the key players should have a stake in the peace. Next, the new government will need to build a greater respect for human rights and the rule of law. Everyone here today will be aware of the terrible abuses that are occurring on a massive scale in the DRC. Many of those take place in the east, at the hands of armed groups, and frequently—something that the Government find particularly disturbing—of the Congolese army itself.

As the elections draw nearer, the Government in the DRC are increasingly clamping down on freedom of expression. At the same time, we are seeing an unchecked rise in the volume of hate speech against certain ethnic groups. The new Government need to tackle all those abuses. As has been strongly demonstrated, the DRC badly needs a reliable, neutral, well trained and properly paid army. We are seeing the beginnings of a new army, but most soldiers are still unpaid, unfed, poorly equipped, and have not yet received effective long-term training.

We obviously need to see an end to the high levels of corruption and the mismanagement of natural resources. Most of all, we need to sustain the huge amount of support and commitment from the international community that has been given in recent years, and we need to ensure that that continues after the elections. Let me say in response to the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) that we also need to ensure that the aid budget is spent effectively and that it benefits the people.

The UK is working to support the DRC in developing a stable and prosperous future. Several speakers mentioned the hospital in Panzi, and I am pleased that through the Department of International Development a further £440,000 will be provided over two years to help with infrastructure and the training of doctors.

A number of hon. Members raised the issue of children accused of witchcraft. We agree that it is a disturbing phenomenon with real human rights implications. Last year, as part of the UK presidency, we led an initiative to raise awareness of the problem of so-called child witches in the DRC, and we will continue to work with civil society groups, established Churches and the Congolese Government to push for further action to address the problem. Through DFID and the British embassy, the UK contributes to programmes under UNICEF, Save the Children and other NGOs that aim to protect children. While on the subject of children, I commend the idea of a link-up project between schools in the DRC and in the UK, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk

A key issue raised by hon. Members was the army. Primary responsibility rests with the DRC to provide a secure environment. Creating a new army after years of conflict is a huge task, and the FARDC consists of seven integrated brigades of troops from all factions. The UK offered £3 million for basic life-needs support—things such as tents and water—to the newly integrated brigades and their families. That will help them to make ends meet and to stop them preying on the local population, but the assistance is offered on the condition that the Government ensure that the troops are paid.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): Will the Minister give way?

Ian Pearson: I have less than a minute, and I am afraid that I cannot.

A number of points have been raised and we will ensure that they are fully taken on board. I acknowledge the work of the all-party group. The stakes in the DRC are incredibly high. The Congolese people have to live with fighting, corruption and human rights abuses every day. The international community has a responsibility to help to deliver the elections and the support that the people of Congo want and need—

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Order. It is with great deal of regret—I offer a personal apology to the Minister—that I have to call the debate to a close. I thank all Members who took part for a moving and purposeful debate. I am sorry that the Minister had such a short time to respond. However, it was important that as many Members as possible were given the opportunity to speak. I also thank the Opposition Front Bench spokesmen for their co-operation. I am sorry, Mr. Wills, that you were not able to intervene.

Action Teams (Middlesbrough)

4.15 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I record my sincere thanks to Mr. Speaker for granting me this debate. I have been trying to secure a debate for three or four months, and I am glad finally to have done so.

I want to speak on an issue that is important to the estates that make up half of my Middlesbrough constituency. The actions plans are important to delivering the Government's programme of getting people off welfare and into work. A key part of such a programme, which has to be based on specialist work, is building confidence and giving self-esteem back to the families and communities that have suffered a history of unemployment. That approach has a particular relevance to communities such as those that I represent in Middlesbrough.

I remember in the 1980s and 1990s knocking on doors in south Middlesbrough, a part of my constituency that suffered massive unemployment. It was a shock to the system to knock on every other door and find that no one was working, that everyone was unemployed. Whole families were jobless. We waited for a Labour Government. I am happy to say that, thanks to the present Government, we are now in a much better situation—it has completely changed. In my constituency, unemployment has dropped by 50 per cent. since 1997, and employment on Teesside is very different from what it was. Youth joblessness has more or less gone. Once upon a time, many left school on the Friday and signed on at the labour exchange on the Monday. I am happy to say that those days have gone.

The policies that my colleagues and I in the Labour party championed have finally been implemented, and we are now seeing success, but the sheer impact of the dark years of the past still linger among those who lost valuable work skills during that time. As a result, intensive work is still needed in particular areas and social groups.

Middlesbrough council has always been active in developing welfare for work and intermediate labour market schemes. Many of them are targeted on particular communities and estates in the town. One initiative was the setting up of the action team for jobs project. The programme is now five years old, and it is managed locally by Working Links. It was originally offered a contract by the Department for Work and Pensions worth some £1.4 million a year. The contract is now in its third which runs from April 2004 to an extended expiry date of October 2006.

The action team targets most of Middlesbrough's wards, including Coulby Newham, Hemlington, Marton, Ladgate, Nunthorpe, Park End, Stainton and Thornton, all of which I represent. Resident participation in the scheme is voluntary, and the majority of clients are accessed through outreach in a range of community venues such as shops, post offices, libraries and Sure Start centres. An estimated 30 per cent. of clients are incapacity benefit claimants, and more than 40 per cent. are ex-offenders.

Project support is tailor-made to individual needs, and there is no limit on the length of time that the action team may support an individual. The longest time an individual has been with the action team is 20 months. Consultants work with clients to alleviate barriers to employment by paying for site safety passports, driving lessons, specialist training, new clothing for interviews and travel costs. The Working Links action team for jobs currently employs in Middlesbrough eight case consultants, who recruit participants on to the programme and work one to one with clients, and a job search consultant, who works intensively with job-ready clients to place them into their desired appointments. Of the 1,214 clients involved with the action team across Middlesbrough, 554 were placed into employment—the target was 380 for the year—of whom 62 per cent. sustained full-time employment. That is an incredible record.

I want to focus on a project in my constituency: Hemlington Works. As the name suggests, the project is geared towards helping jobless people in Hemlington, south Middlesbrough. The project helps people who face barriers such as economic and social isolation, low-skill levels, lack of work experience and low self-esteem and confidence. I had the honour of opening the Hemlington Works centre in April 2004. The project is a multi-agency partnership, funded by Jobcentre Plus and Middlesbrough council, which provides support through a range of providers to people seeking work in the Hemlington, Coulby Newham, and Stainton and Thornton areas. The main partners are Middlesbrough council, which provides the management; Working Links, which engages with incapacity benefit and income support claimants; and Jobcentre Plus, which provides advisors on disability and for lone parents. Other agencies that offer support include Connexions, the Shaw Trust, Pertemps, the Prince's Trust, Reed in Partnership and Community Campus.

The project helps local residents to improve their chances of gaining employment. It is a working partnership that provides specialist knowledge to people of the estate, and offers a consistent and high-quality service to local men and women. So far, 150 of the 525 clients involved with the project have found sustainable employment beyond 13 weeks. That is a credible performance considering that the area bore the brunt of the devastation of the '80s and early '90s, and has high indices of illness and incapacity benefit claims.

Hemlington Works is funded until March 2008. If the action team for jobs element goes in October, the project will carry on with the support of the council and other providers, but the Working Links action team is the key provider of work with income support clients and, crucially, incapacity benefit claimants. That is a key factor, given the new drive for people claiming that benefit to be diverted back into work, which is a priority for the Department for Work and Pensions and the Government. The loss of that service would be detrimental to employment and training provision as a whole, as only intensive, localised, personal and flexible support can work with such hard to reach and often alienated groups.

4.24 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.33 pm

On resuming—

Dr. Kumar: As I was saying, areas such as Hemlington have received much help from the Government over the years, and that has been warmly welcomed by local people and by Middlesbrough council, but much of the funding comes as a part of a cocktail—that is, it comes from a variety of sources, including local authorities, national Government, such as the Department for Work and Pensions, and the voluntary and community sectors. All parties to that funding have their own priorities and programmes and a recurring problem is that the different funding agencies often have different cut-off dates.

I appreciate that the DWP, with other Departments, emphasises to project managers the importance of having good exit strategies, but I have to tell the Minister that in the context of a three-year programme, that can mean that local organisations are expected to prepare to wind up in an orderly fashion just as they are beginning to produce good results in the community. That is a feature common to many social regeneration programmes and it has been identified as a key weakness by many independent observers and social analysts.

A recent study on urban regeneration programmes in England and Scotland by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, an organisation that I admire, said that many local initiatives championed by sponsoring Ministries had a "lack of common vision on which to build consensus and guide policy, and a short-term approach to regeneration policy and funding."

The foundation also argued that capacity-building in local communities was a long-term process, and that although physical regeneration programmes can be accelerated, work with people and communities affected by a history of unemployment needed time.

Finally, I have a concern about people working on the action team for jobs programme. Their contract has been extended until October. They are dedicated staff, and they have given a lot of their valuable time to make things work, but they need reassurances as much as their clients do. I am concerned that if no long-term extension to the programme is granted, they will seek employment elsewhere in the private or public sectors and in consequence bring the project to a premature end. They have done sterling work with a community that values that work, and with individuals and families who have clearly benefited personally from their intervention.

I hope that the Minister will take on board what I have said. I hope that she will reassure me that the need to keep the programme is recognised, and that she will give support to the action team for jobs in Middlesbrough, because many of my constituents strongly believe that it has done valuable work. It is thanks to the Labour Government that we have been able to achieve so much success.

4.37 pm

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) on securing the debate. I know of his concerns about the action team because he wrote to me recently about it. He works extremely hard and diligently in representing the interests of his constituents in Westminster, and I congratulate him on that, too.

I agree entirely with the tribute that my hon. Friend paid to the work of action teams, both in his constituency and more widely. The action teams were a pilot programme that we started in 2000, and there are now 64 action teams around the country. They are focused in areas of particular deprivation and worklessness, and their strength is that they can engage in more innovative ways of reaching people, so that they can start discussing the possibilities of work with people who may not have sought that as an option for themselves. They can then work through and tackle the barriers that individuals face and help them into work.

Through the action teams across the country, nearly 160,000 people have successfully been supported back into work. Some teams are run by Jobcentre Plus and some by private and voluntary sector providers, including Working Links, which is one of our key providers. We have looked at the performance of private and voluntary sector providers. It may interest my hon. Friend to hear that in the particular set of interventions that we are talking about, Jobcentre Plus teams tend to do better than some private and voluntary sector providers; that certainly interested me. Jobcentre Plus teams tend to be better at reaching out to those who are very distant from the labour market, whereas in an outcome-based contract, the private and voluntary sectors tend, on the whole, to go for those who are easier to reach, so that they can hit their target.

That leaves us with a challenge as we think about the next phase of the work. On the whole, the action teams have been extremely successful. In the year up to February 2006—not the whole year, just 11 months—the action team in Middlesbrough outperformed its targets. It achieved 477 job entries against a target of 380. Its target for reaching those people who are distant from the labour market and would not be reached through the new deal programmes was 266. In fact, the action team reached 356 people. It is a good record, and I congratulate the action team on its work.

We must set the context in which we are considering the future. When we established action teams, there was little activity or active labour market intervention with people other than those on the traditional new deal schemes, such as jobseeker's allowance. So the new deal for young people and the new deal 25-plus were up and running, and we were beginning to experiment with a new deal for lone parents, but there was little intervention with the incapacity benefit group and with the broader income support group, and there was no intervention with those who were not claiming any benefits but who were, nevertheless, out of work. Therefore, it was in that context that we established the action teams.

Since the establishment of the action teams, we have created Jobcentre Plus, bringing together in one place the processes to claim benefit and the initial and continuing advice to support people back to work. It is an innovative second phase of our welfare reform programme. As this round of the action team programme comes to an end, we are thinking about the future in the context of a changed environment, with Jobcentre Plus starting to engage in a much more active way with people with whom, in the past, it would not have engaged. That includes people on income support, those who claim incapacity benefit, and those who do not work but do not claim any benefits.

The second change, of which my hon. Friend will be well aware, involves the proposals and propositions contained in the welfare reform Green Paper. Through pathways to work, which, by October, will be up and running in about one third of the country, we are beginning to engage actively with incapacity benefit claimants in the early stages of their lives on that benefit. It is one of the most effective labour market interventions attempted throughout the developed world to deal with that group of people who face incredible barriers and huge challenges in trying to return to the workplace. Through pathways to work, we have successfully ensured that 8 per cent. more people than ever before have come off incapacity benefit during the first six months of their lives on that benefit. This is a new innovative engagement with people on incapacity benefit that did not exist when action teams were first created.

As my hon. Friend will know, we have plans to ensure that pathways to work are offered across the country by 2008. We have reprioritised our departmental budget and have secured an additional £360 million to ensure that it can be offered to all new incapacity benefit claimants by 2008. Much of the work carried out initially by action teams will be encompassed by pathways to work. We have also decided that the next phase of the roll-out of pathways to work will not be done through Jobcentre Plus but through private and voluntary providers. It is such ground-breaking public policy that we want lots of innovation and the greater flexibility that the private and voluntary sector enjoy, which is not always present in statutory agencies. The private and voluntary sector is often better placed to get multi-agency working, which my hon. Friend talked about, on the ground. We want to experiment and to keep trying to discover what works so that we can build on that best practice as we roll out services to our clients who are on incapacity benefit.

I have had long discussions with Working Links and have absolutely no doubt that it will be active in the new market that we are creating to provide the services for people in local communities. There will be opportunities for Working Links to carry on doing much of the work it has been engaged in to date in places such as Middlesbrough and elsewhere. I had a meeting yesterday with Working Links in Wales about its work. It is very much action-team led at present, but it will develop in the broader context.

I hope that my hon. Friend will take my next important point back to his constituency. There is a concept in the welfare reform Green Paper which is incredibly important in tackling worklessness in the much more constrained fiscal environment of the coming years. Throughout the country, under the Labour Government, there have been many new programmes and innovations involving training and skills deficits, worklessness and community regeneration in which access to a job is a vital and central ingredient.

The £100 million a year that goes into Bradford, for example, to tackle worklessness comes from the Department for Work and Pensions, the Learning and

[Margaret Hodge]

Skills Council through the Department for Education and Skills, local authorities, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister via the inner-city regeneration programmes, Europe and the regional development agencies. There is a huge range of funding streams, many of them targeted at the same group of people. As my hon. Friend rightly said, they have different time frames and slightly different objectives, but they are all trying to do the same thing.

What is proposed in the welfare reform Green Paper will bring the separate funding agencies, the funding streams and the partners together as a consortium in a locality, starting in cities where worklessness is one of the most challenging problems. We will set them very simple outcome targets and shift away from a process-driven endeavour to an outcome-driven effort. I hope that they will then decide either to pool their budgets or at the very least align them and work together to achieve the objectives, which will give much greater flexibility.

We have negotiated with the Treasury what is quite a breakthrough in the way in which we run the public finances: an agreement in principle—we have to work through the detail of it—that if a city or a locality is effective in getting more people into work and therefore cutting the benefit bill, some of the savings that the Government get can be reinvested in the city through further services. That will give Middlesbrough and other parts of the country a framework in which they can operate in a creative way, responsive to their local circumstances. It will enable them to tackle the very long-term and difficult worklessness that my hon. Friend, like most hon. Members, faces in his constituency.

Jobcentre Plus, the welfare reform Green Paper, pathways to work and the city strategy are informing how we look forward. At the same time, we are looking carefully at the lessons we have learned from the action teams, and we are taking things forward. For example, we know that outreach work is particularly important in respect of certain groups who might be very distant from the labour market—there might be cultural boundaries or third-generation worklessness in families, or there might be issues to do with low skills levels or poor English. Individuals face a range of barriers, and outreach is a key way of trying to start that initial engagement, which draws people into appropriate programmes to bring them closer to the workplace. We have understood that.

Something else we have understood is the power of discretionary funding. My hon. Friend described the way it is used in Middlesbrough. Traditionally, many of the new deal programmes have been very process-driven. If we can get more discretion into the way in which we operate, we can build services around the needs of the individual in a much more direct and beneficial manner, and therefore get more effect for the money we spend, and help more people who are coming into work through that. We will take on board those lessons as we move forward.

We will continue to have an area-based approach, which is what the action team for jobs was all about. That clearly makes sense. We hope that that will grow through the city strategy, but until that strategy is in place across the country, we will take and pull together the money that went on the action teams for jobs and money that has been used for ethnic minority outreach work, for example, and for the working neighbourhood pilots—another area-based pilot that has been taking place across the country.

What we are thinking of then doing—my hon. Friend can reflect on this and write to me if he feels it makes sense in respect of his constituency—is leaving it to Jobcentre Plus at district level to determine how best to allocate those resources. We will concentrate the resources, probably on the 1,000 most deprived wards in the country, but we will leave the decision on how best to use that money to the Jobcentre Plus district manager.

In some instances—this may be the case in Middlesbrough—the decision might be made to continue the work of the action team for jobs work which my hon. Friend believes is so effective. I hope that district managers will properly consult local representatives and other stakeholders, but allowing that discretion at local level is the beginning of the decentralisation in the use of resources that I want to see. That is the most effective way to have an impact, particularly in an environment of tight financial constraints.

The sum that we are talking about is probably in the region of £90 million over the two-year period. The resources are generous; we are not cutting the programme. We will just try to learn lessons, decentralise decision making, and then leave things for the local district managers to decide. What happens in Middlesbrough will not be my decision; it will be the district manager's decision. He is closer to the ground, and he will make more effective decisions.

I hope my hon. Friend agrees that what matters is not the programme itself; it is the work that that programme undertook. We want to maintain that and to learn from where it has been effective. It has been more effective in some areas than in others. We need to engage with those areas where it has been effective.

The aim in respect of this very difficult group of people who have never really thought about work before is to reach out to them and to bring them into the labour market so that they can enhance their lives and contribute to the local and national economies. That is groundbreaking. Letting many flowers bloom in different areas is a good way of moving forward.

We are determined to tackle worklessness. I know that that also underpins my hon. Friend's concerns about what happens in his area. We also want to ensure that, through the use of our resources, we provide greater opportunity for all. The right to work is as important as many other civil rights that we have all been pursuing in our various guises throughout our working lives. Work gives one not only the wherewithal to sustain oneself and one's family, but a network of friends. It also ensures that within a community and a circle, a person has status and purpose. That gives them a sense of value and contributes to the strong community that we know makes for a better Britain.

Special Needs (Somerset)

4.55 pm

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): I am delighted to have secured this debate, on a very sensitive and important issue that affects us all.

The very term "special needs" places pupils and their parents in a separate category with labels all of their own, not all of which are complimentary. They are different—they did not mean to be different, but they are. People with special needs do not automatically slot into any mainstream. In the textbook of education, they are unfortunately classed as not normal, which is a harsh thing to say. Special needs covers a multiplicity of factors that can influence a child's schooling at all stages, levels and ages. Some children may be struggling to overcome dyslexia, as I am. Quite often, their home life is also strained in many ways.

Disabilities of mind, body, behaviour, upbringing and spirit can all qualify for the strange status and mythical term "special needs." Society, with commendable politeness, puts every person with special needs, including myself as a dyslexic, down as "challenging people," which is a difficult term.

In Somerset, we owe a great debt of gratitude to the dedication and professionalism of the men and women who run the county's education service, especially Jon Rose, who heads it, and Mike Turner, who looks after all special needs teaching. They are two exemplary people. Without their efforts, special—or, dare I say, challenging—people would require something extra from state schooling and could be considerably worse off. I have no gripe with the specialists and staff at the sharp end, but—there is always a "but," as the Minister knows—I have a real concern about the financial decision making at local and national level. That is why I asked for this debate.

The town of Minehead in west Somerset is probably best known for Butlins—it has the largest Butlins—buckets and spades, normally in that order. However, for a resident of the town with a child who fits into the category of special needs, there is a wonderful facility available at the Minehead first school, an excellent school that has recently had a top-flight report. The question is, how long will the accountants allow it to stay? Rather like what is happening in the NHS to cash-strapped hospitals desperately trying to balance their books, the money for special needs seems to matter more than actually meeting the needs.

Somerset county council plans to close six special needs units. When I say the county council, I mean the elected leadership. It is unfortunately a political plan. The people who will be left to make it work will do their utmost to stretch resources and to provide as much care as they can. If they fail, what transpires will lie squarely at the feet of the elected councillors.

Minehead is not the only place that will be seriously affected by the new policy. However, it typifies the geographical layout, unfortunately, of much of the county of Somerset. I wonder whether the Minister has ever been to Minehead.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle) indicated dissent.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: The Minister shakes her head; I urge her to come, she would love it. I would supply her, if she likes, with good maps and a list of useful items that she should bring, such as buckets and spades. She should certainly look around the area.

The point that I am trying to make is that Minehead is a long way down a meandering and overcrowded road. It is a long way from anywhere else. It is not easy to get to and public transport already leaves an enormous amount to be desired. The sheer distance between communities makes the provision of all educational needs much more arduous and extremely financially complex. If facilities in the six special needs units are withdrawn, the consequences are obvious: either the children will physically have to travel further, or the specialist staff that remain in the schools will have to make longer journeys instead. For society—for all of us—either course carries a high price.

I am told that the proposed solution for Minehead will be a small specialist unit based within the area, possibly at our college or middle school, and the staff will have a remit to travel around the different schools in the area—to give the Chamber some idea of the scale, London fits easily into west Somerset—as a sort of flying squad of educational specialists. It sounds workable at first, I agree, but there will probably be only four specialists, who will all have to spend several hours a day simply getting about. The sums do not seem to add up. The time for being with each child will be more and more limited.

I am concerned mainly as the Member of Parliament who represents west Somerset and Bridgwater, but I have always listened with great interest and reasoned care to organisations of parents who have children at special needs units in Somerset and who are trying to protect the existing services. I pay tribute to their determined stance. Let me quote briefly what they have written about the proposed change. They say:

> "It will undermine the educational opportunities of children, and take away an important element of communities. It will weaken the educational provision for children with special needs.
> We are not against willingness to change, or value for money—we are against a half-baked plan being pushed through a half-baked process at great expense and without any sense of direction.
> We oppose this plan because it is stupid and the work of a bully who refuses to engage with the communities she is undermining."

Those are strong words from the parents of children with all manner of behavioural and other disabilities.

The bully's name is Councillor Gloria Cawood, who holds the education brief for the county of Somerset. She has apparently accused the parents of self-interest, as though the provision of special needs was like building a new housing estate. She has not put it so brutally, but I think that she thinks that those people are nimbys in their crudest form. Politicians, we all know, do not always hit it off with pressure groups, but they ought to go out of their way to be careful when it comes to dealing with the parents of children with special needs. Such parents do not form a pressure group in ignorance. They are informed and well aware of how complex the issues are, and as they have to deal with children with special needs every single day of their lives—they live with them, they are their children—they understand the cost and, quite often, the pain. They are always the first to praise the professionals who help, without a shadow of a doubt.

[Mr. Liddell-Grainger]

Mrs. Cawood has made some very influential enemies. I understand and accept that the Minister holds no responsibility for Somerset county council, but I hope that she will join me in wishing an early end to the misunderstandings that have arisen and a beginning to sensible discussion. Only by dialogue can the problems be resolved to the benefit of those children.

Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) cannot be in the Chamber because of other priorities in the House. However, he has been in contact with the group whose views I have just quoted. He told me that he has penned an open letter to the county council voicing his concern as the Member of Parliament for Taunton. I am delighted that he has finally got off the fence—rah, rah! I would have liked him to have made a contribution, but unfortunately he cannot. He does, however, realise the importance of helping the children at all levels.

Perhaps it is because special needs span such a wide range of human difficulties that we politicians are guilty of trying to avoid the issues. The more we look at the subject, the bigger the problems seem to become, and, as the Minister knows, the more money they cost to tackle. Our system of distributing resources is seriously flawed. Governments of any persuasion provide cash to local education authorities and prefer not to be involved unless something goes badly wrong. We have all had experience of that in our constituencies. The fault is almost always somebody else's and unfortunately the buck never stops.

Th. Minister will probably regale the Chamber with details of the generosity of her Administration. That is fine. bit I have little doubt that more money is still needed, not only for Somerset but throughout the whole nation, especially in rural areas, given the great distances and problems that they face. So many people choose to ignore or do not understand the issue of rural deprivation. Perhaps other counties argue their cases with more fervour and get a bigger slice of the available cake. I do not know, but surely more resources are needed for everybody—surely an issue as complex and sensitive as special needs deserves and should receive a more flexible approach.

Right now about 90 children in Somerset are deemed to require such special needs help that the county has to export them to get it. Those 90 children go to neighbouring counties at Somerset's expense. However, the numbers are similar in most English counties; for example, Devon sends Somerset some of its own children and Somerset thus recoups precious cash. That is the norm. If special needs provision is to be left to the counties to administer, surely that is an odd manifestation of best practice. I am not saying that it should not happen, but I wonder why it does and would be interested to hear the Minister's comments on that.

My investigations into this complicated area of policy have local and personal origins. Dyslexia runs in my family. I have two dyslexic daughters and I have made it my business to seek the best specialist advice available. As a parent, I have consulted Britain's foremost authorities on special needs. When I met one of the three most renowned experts in the country, of whom I believe the Minister is aware, I was very surprised to learn that none of those three had discussed special needs with any Minister; in fact, they have never been to the Department to talk about the overall picture of special needs.

Given that Professors Ricky Richardson, David Skuse and Richard Kitney are among the three best brains in the country when it comes to assessing special needs and advising on treatment, that lack of contact is a serious oversight. I ask the Minister whether she would be prepared to extend an invitation to those three gentlemen so that she can talk to them about the future of special needs—not merely in relation to me or anyone else, but in relation to the whole country—to ascertain the best way to help special needs children. The children must always remain the priority.

My purpose today has been to highlight the real concern in my constituency. It is the pressure on the country and the problems that lie ahead for professionals and parents alike that are the cause of my concern. I would be delighted to do what I can to help the Minister reach a decision on the best way to help children throughout the United Kingdom.

5.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) not only on obtaining the debate, which is on an important subject—especially so in his area at the moment—but also on the way in which he set out his concerns. I share his objective of securing better outcomes for children with special educational needs in Somerset, given that I used to be Minister for disabled people. I would prefer to call children with special educational needs disabled children, because they equate to that similar group.

It is unfortunate that some recent debates on the subject were based on a fundamental misconception of Government policy, particularly in relation to special schools and special provisions. I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is categorically not the Government's policy to close special schools or to force children into mainstream education irrespective of their needs, their parents' wishes or of any support that they might receive.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned politics, and I know that in some instances local decision makers have resorted to alleging that they are driven by pressure from elsewhere. When one looks at the legal powers, one can see that the argument is not sustainable. None the less, it can gain currency. It is not the Government's policy to have inclusion at all costs. However, it is our policy to ensure, when suitable, if the parents want it and if it is likely to help, that disabled children should have access to mainstream education in greater numbers than in the past, when it was too easily assumed that separation was best. As a consequence of such policies, many young disabled children did not receive the quality of education that they deserved, and it set them off in life with a disadvantage that was hard to overcome.

Some argue that inclusion has gone too far. However, although the number of special schools has declined over recent years, the number of children taught in them has remained broadly constant at around 1.2 per cent. of the total school population. Everyone in the Chamber believes that it is the quality of the child's educational experience that is important, and not where they are taught. Children can thrive in different settings, even at different times of the day. There is nothing wrong with having specialist provision in a mainstream setting where, if suitable, children can switch between one and the other, but it depends on the individual needs of the children and the capacity of those settings to meet such needs. There is no dogma: we want what is best for children. The hon. Gentleman made it clear that that is what he seeks.

Our policy, clearly stated in our long-term strategy document "Removing Barriers to Achievement", is to build capacity across the system by encouraging local authorities to develop a continuum of provision through building the capacity of mainstream and special schools to cope with that range of needs, co-locating special and mainstream schools when sensible, and promoting collaboration between schools in order to share expertise.

As has always been the case, changes will continue to be made to individual schools, both special and mainstream, in the light of local needs and demands. Local authorities and schools are best placed to respond to the needs of pupils within their area. It would not be sensible for me to spend my time sat at a desk in Whitehall making decisions about school reorganisations in Somerset or anywhere else. We do not want to return to that way of doing things.

Thinking about what is best for children is what I assume is going on in Somerset. I assume that that is what is behind the plans for reorganisation in other places, too. I emphasise, however, that the Government's aim is to improve outcomes for disabled children; it is not to marginalise or ignore their needs, nor is it to use reorganisation as a way of making provision worse. Plans that emerge, although being locally determined, should demonstrably make improvements and should make things better for disabled children.

The hon. Gentleman may well be aware that, from December this year, all public sector bodies, including local authorities and schools, will come under a duty to promote the equality of opportunity of disabled people generally, including disabled children. Proper chances at school will be a key part of those bodies being able to demonstrate that they are fulfilling that duty, which is being brought in under the Disability Discrimination Act 2005.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that I might talk about the great generosity of the Government in terms of increased funding. I am obviously extremely predictable; I was going to make brief mention of the fact that there has been a big increase in funding. There is no doubt about that. Certainly, between 1997–98 and 2003–04, there was a big increase in extra funding for special educational needs, both in per-pupil terms and overall through specific special grants. Between 2001–02 and 2005–06, the spend went from £2.8 billion to £4.1 billion, specifically in respect of special needs, and there has been an increase of £360 million through special grants. Somerset has had its share of that; its increase is just slightly under the average.

So there is no doubt that there has been more money, but in the current spending review there have also been additional opportunities through the "building schools for the future" programme, which is worth more than £2 billion a year. That provides a stimulus and investment for local authorities so that they can transform the pattern of local provision for children with special educational needs and disabled children and put particular emphasis on co-locating mainstream and specialist provision for children with special educational needs.

I hope that the suggestions being made in Somerset will lead to an improvement in outcomes for disabled children; that is what the authorities ought to aim to do. However, it is a matter for local decision. As is the case with the hon. Gentleman, my local council does not happen to be under the political control of the party of which I am a member, so there can be substantial debates locally about issues such as schools reorganisation. Of course I agree absolutely that we should listen to parent pressure groups because they really are the experts, and know on a day-to-day basis the precise impact on individual children of what can sometimes seem like bureaucratic and process-based changes.

On the decision in Somerset, I think that the council has decided to make the changes. It has gone with option 3, I think, which will mean something to people in Somerset. It will now have to justify that, via the process of the school organisation committee, which has a decision-making capacity. If there is no consensus—it does not seem that there is, from what the hon. Gentleman said, and from what I have been told—the independent schools adjudicator will make the final decision.

I hope that everybody concerned in the area will look to improve outcomes for the disabled children who will be affected and their parents. That has got to mean listening carefully to what parents have to say, although it does not necessarily mean acceding to everything that they suggest. In that respect, I endorse the hon. Gentleman's call for sensible discussion locally. That has got to be the next step, now that the council has decided what it wants to do on the basis of its various options. There has to be even more consultation and proper listening, so that parents feel a part of the process and that their concerns have been listened to, and if the council is to assuage their fears. They can then either agree with, or at least understand, what it is trying to do through the changes that it proposes.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the buck never stops, because central Government send money out and say, "Don't ask us to make a decision. Here's the money. You sort it all out. We want these kinds of outcomes." I think that the buck does stop; it tends to stop in local elections. When the power to make such decisions is at a local level, it is clear where the accountability lies. I am sure that at some stage the local electorate will decide whether whatever emerges from the proposals for change has worked. That is as it should be; the decision should be with the local electorate. I am sure that at some stage the parents will be able to make their views known in a highly effective way that makes politicians listen.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I do not disagree with the Minister. One problem, as she is aware, is that there is now a press blame game. The press are leading the agenda; they are pushing it forward. The Minister is right, but does she agree that we are talking about the most vulnerable parents, who do not have time to get involved in active politics because looking after the children for whom they are responsible—as we all are—takes up so much time on a day-to-day basis?

Maria Eagle: It sounds to me as though the parents are already involved in active politics, given that they have been seeing their local Members of Parliament from all parties and garnering support. That is my definition of some active involvement in local politics. As those who perhaps have more expertise, the parents would be listened to carefully by all local stakeholders. Some councillors and officials—I am not pointing fingers at particular people; I do not know any of them—may wish that the parents were a little quieter, but consultation and discussion locally is about listening as well as talking.

Between all sides, the matter will have to be resolved and one hopes that that will be done in a way that satisfies the vast majority and that there will be consensus. Certainly the hon. Gentleman and I agree—I hope that many people in Somerset, including parents, also agree—that the outcomes have to be better for the disabled children receiving teaching and support in the units proposed for closure. My understanding is that a significant transition period is proposed between now and when the closures are due to come into force. That helps, but clearly those making the proposals will have to do more convincing for stakeholders to accept them fully.

When I had a look at Somerset's reputation and its Ofsted reports, I saw that there were encouraging things to be said. I accept that Somerset's last Ofsted report was in January 2002 and so predates by some significant time the proposals that we are discussing. None the less, it is clear from the reports that there is some good practice and provision and that there are good arrangements to build on, which is encouraging. That must be a positive thing. We want better outcomes for all disabled children locally, but Somerset is not starting with a blank slate.

The hon. Gentleman said that more money was needed for rural areas. I hope that I have convinced him that there is more money. It sounds to me as though what is needed now is good old-fashioned negotiations and discussions among all the parties. I am sure that he and hon. Members of other political persuasions will be involved in ensuring that that process is as successful as possible. I hope that, as a result, the decision that is implemented and the arrangements that are finally made will do better by the children in the units proposed for closure. That is the bottom line. In no way would the hon. Gentleman, the Government or anyone else in this Room endorse any changes that made things harder or worse for disabled children. We want improved outcomes. The policy of the Government and the extra money that has been sent down to localities such as Somerset are clearly aimed at improving outcomes. We have to aspire for all our children and we do. I am sure that many people in Somerset apart from the parents do just that as well.

I note that the hon. Gentleman has family experience of dyslexia. He made points about experts who are around somewhere—in the Palace, as I understand it.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: They are at Great Ormond Street and are probably three of the most distinguished experts in the United Kingdom. They work within London right across the spectrum of special needs.

Maria Eagle: The hon. Gentleman says that we are talking about a spectrum disorder and he knows better than I, because of his experience. Tackling spectrum disorders forms an important part of the Department's work in respect of moderate learning disability. We try to garner expertise and use it where we can.

In that regard, I am happy for my officials and, if there is a sensible point to it, for me to meet the people that the hon. Gentleman suggests. We have some links at departmental level with those who deal with dyslexia—for example, the British Dyslexia Association, with which he might be familiar. We funded the production of its resource pack for schools called "Achieving dyslexia friendly schools". Somerset is one of the better counties in that regard.

It being twenty-six minutes past Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Forensic Science

[Relevant documents: Seventh Report from the Science and Technology Committee, Session 2004–05, HC 96, and the Government's response thereto, HC 427, the First Special Report from the Science and Technology Committee, Session 2005–06, HC 427.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watts.]

Mr. Greg Pope (in the Chair): I call Dr. Gibson.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): It is the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) who should speak first.

2.30 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I am sorry to disappoint you, Mr. Pope. None the less, I thank you for your inspirational chairmanship at the beginning of our sitting and welcome you to the Chair. I look forward to what should be an interesting debate on the issue of forensic science on trial.

I am delighted to open the debate on our predecessor Committee's report, which was published in March 2005. I pay tribute to the Committee, and it is good to see at least three of its members here today. The report is wide ranging and thought provoking and covers an area of science that has an increasing fascination for almost all parts of society.

The report was one of the first that I read when I became the Committee's Chairman after the last election, and it brought home to me the enormous contribution that science and technology make to fighting crime. It also emphasised the tremendous benefits to be gained from strengthening the relationship between practitioners in science and the law. Given it's importance and relevance, the Government's response was, to put it mildly, patchy. Indeed, despite being composed of newcomers to the subject, the new Committee was so disappointed by the Government's response to the recommendations on the use of scientific and expert evidence in courts that we decided to hold a follow-up sitting on it with Ministers in November 2005.

It took a little gentle persuasion to get the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs, the Attorney-General and the Minister—although he was willing—to come along at the same time to talk to us. However, we were honoured to have the undivided attention of that august triumvirate and we were not disappointed, because our proceedings were very fruitful, and I thank the Minister and his colleagues for engaging so constructively in an absolutely superb sitting. I should also like to think that we did our bit for joined-up government by getting the three of them together to talk about forensic science—apparently for the first time. I have no doubt that they were all up last night preparing for this debate and discussing the merits of how to respond. It was great to see them.

My task today is to provide an overview of the key themes in the report, to give a brief update on relevant developments and to highlight some of the issues that remain to be addressed by the Government. I am sure that my colleagues on the former Committee and the present Committee will want to expand on the topics that I raise.

The first issue is the changing status of the Forensic Science Service. The Government's decision to develop the service into a Government-owned company, or a GovCo, with a possible progression to a public-private partnership thereafter, has been a source of great controversy. On the one hand, there is enormous and understandable concern about the implications of the possible privatisation of the country's leading provider of forensic science services. On the other hand, competitor providers, such as the Forensic Alliance and LGC, are frustrated at what they see as the lack of a level playing field as regards competition for forensic science services, particularly where police forces are involved.

The predecessor Committee took the Government to task over their handling of the transformation process, calling the presentation of the decision "misleading and confusing" and highlighting the need for greater transparency and accountability. It simply cannot be right for the Government to set the criteria by which the FSS GovCo will be assessed, then, as the sole shareholder, to assess whether those criteria have been met and then to influence the management of the FSS during the transition. That process must be wrong. We welcome the Minister's recent publication of the criteria used for that assessment, as requested in the report, but there is still room for greater independent oversight of the process.

The report was clear that the GovCo should not be set up to fail. It must be given the chance to succeed in its own right and must not be just a transitional step to a public-private partnership. I warmly welcome the Government's recent commitment not to make any firm decisions about the future of the FSS until summer 2007, but I urge them to extend that commitment, if at all possible. The FSS GovCo should be guaranteed a minimum two-year trial period in which to prove itself and to ensure that it has a realistic chance of success. The PPP should not be an inevitability, and I hope that the Minister will give us an assurance on that today.

I hope also that the Government will do the right thing by FSS staff, who have made a fantastic contribution to the fight against crime. Uncertainty about the organisation's future has hit staff hardest. The Minister gave us a confused picture of the provisions being made for the transferral of FSS staff pensions to the new scheme when the issue came before the Committee last year. As I think he will recall, he first promised the full continuation of the existing arrangements, but later withdrew that commitment. I hope that he has been clearer in his communications with the staff than he has been with us, and I look forward to a clear statement from him today about the pension arrangements for FSS staff who have transferred into the new GovCo. The Government must do their utmost to ensure that the FSS remains an attractive employer, because it is far too important a national asset to be allowed to fall into a state of decay.

The report also argued that the need for an independent regulator is becoming ever more critical at a time of transition in the forensic science market. The Committee recommended that the Government establish a forensic science advisory council to oversee the regulation of the forensic science market and to provide independent and impartial advice on forensic science. The Government accepted the broad thrust of that recommendation and promised to consider it in their review of the forensic science services market, but we got the impression that they were not keen on setting up a new body. I think that I speak for the past Committee and the present Committee when I urge the Government to take the issue seriously. We have already seen the merger of two major competitors to the FSS—Forensic Alliance and LGC—and further mergers or takeovers in the forensics market could lead the service into uncharted territory. It is essential that the Government have continued access to independent, impartial advice and that we maintain a strong forensic science base in the United Kingdom. Will the Minister give us an update on those issues?

On the challenging issue of the national DNA database, the latest figures indicate that in 2004–05 alone, 40,000 crimes were detected with the aid of DNA intelligence matches. DNA profiling is without doubt a key weapon in the police armoury against crime, but the national DNA database could be described as a double-edged sword. Recent figures published by the Home Office show that police in Britain hold significantly more DNA samples than police in any other country. There are more than 3 million samples on the national DNA database, accounting for more than 5 per cent. of the population. That compares with 1 per cent. in the United States and an average of 0.3 per cent. in other European Union countries.

Not surprisingly, there have been accusations from various quarters that profiling represents a dangerous erosion of civil liberties. We know that certain ethnic minorities are over-represented on the database; indeed, some 24 per cent. of people on it are non-white, even though only 8 per cent. of the population as a whole is black or Asian. A recent article in The Guardian suggested that the DNA of 37 per cent. of black men in the UK is now stored on the database, compared with 13 per cent. for Asian men and 9 per cent. for white men. Ministers cannot just repeat the mantra that innocent people have nothing to fear from the database, because evidence clearly shows that there is an ethnic bias in the profiles that are stored. We must counter the perception that the Government and the police are using stealth tactics to secure information without justification. Such perceptions provide a breeding ground for suspicion, and they create the potential for a backlash against the technology. Perhaps the Minister will explain what the Government have done to address the risk that is posed to public perceptions of the criminal justice system.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Was the hon. Gentleman as alarmed as I was to learn through a series of questions tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Grant Shapps) that there are a number of minors on the DNA database? Although it may become proper practice to keep innocent people's information on the database, does not the hon. Gentleman agree that that practice ought to be determined by the House, rather than by just keeping on the database people who happened to be there and were then not removed?

Mr. Willis: I could not be more grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who, as ever, is right on the ball. I was just coming to that point. He is quite right, because another major source of contention centres around the revelation that 24,000 profiles of 10 to 18-year-olds are stored on the database, despite them never having been cautioned for, charged with or convicted of any offence. Chief constables retain discretionary powers to order the removal of a profile from the database, and I welcome the decision by the Association of Chief Police Officers to issue guidance about when and how discretion should be exercised.

However, the Government need to consider the wider public concern about the storage of DNA profiles of innocent juveniles—the very point made by the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant). I hope that the Minister will assure the House that he intends to rectify that unacceptable situation and will agree to issue clear guidance to chief constables about the retention of DNA profiles.

The proliferation of forensic science degree courses is one of the most intriguing aspects of the Committee's report. A recent visit to the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service website, which I undertook this week, showed that for September, I could choose from 445 degree courses with forensic in their title. At London Metropolitan university, I could take forensic science with either sports science or consumer studies. Quite what one does with forensic science and consumer studies, I do not know.

Canterbury Christ Church university could offer me a degree in forensic investigation and tourism and leisure studies, or music with forensic investigation. I should not want to suggest, in the words of the right hon. Member for Barking (Margaret Hodge), when she had ministerial responsibilities for higher education, that they are all Mickey Mouse courses. But the massive expansion in forensic science and allied courses has taken place largely without quality control, and the value of some of those courses is, as employers would tell us, dubious to say the least.

The clear message that emerged from the evidence taken during the predecessor Committee's inquiry was that employers wanted students with a good grounding in basic science. They prefer to employ chemistry graduates over graduates of forensic science or its more exotic allied degrees. The message is not getting through to students, however. While the number of forensic science students has rocketed during the past five years, the number taking chemistry declined by 27 per cent. between 1994–95 to 2001–02, and by a further 7 per cent. between 2002–03 and 2003–04. It is a matter of huge concern to the Committee, which is about to publish a follow-up report on the strategic science provision in universities, analysing the refocusing of chemistry at the university of Sussex.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): The hon. Gentleman raises an important point about bringing students into forensic sciences. My main concern is that there is little joined-up thinking between the encouragement given to students to go into the important field of forensic sciences and the lack of resources going into sciences in general and chemistry in particular. We heard a very poor message from the Government when they responded to the closure of the chemistry department at the university of Sussex and, before that, the closure of the chemistry department at the university of Exeter. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that those give grave concern to everyone.

Mr. Willis: I entirely agree. When the predecessor Committee considered the provision of strategic science, it made it clear that unless there is a sufficient supply of chemistry, physics, maths and engineering graduates, the whole country will suffer. We have often had that discussion with the Minister for Science and Innovation, Lord Sainsbury of Turville. It is not good enough to say that science is expanding, simply because a course has science in its title. It has to have a basis in basic science to underpin that.

The point that I am making, which the Committee also makes, is that it is great that Amanda Burton and "Silent Witness" have created a huge amount of interest in forensic science; but unless we underpin it with good, basic science, we shall miss out. The Department for Education and Skills and, indeed, the Higher Education Funding Council have a duty to ensure that forensic science courses are up to the mark. A forensic science course without a substantial chemistry component should be thrown out under the trade descriptions act. There cannot be good forensic science without chemistry.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said so far, but does not he agree that the problem with the Government is that they see higher education as a free market? If students want to study a course because they have seen something on television, or for any other reason, that is what universities will provide. The Government do not seem to have any interest in ensuring a flow of students through the courses that this country needs them to study. The Government's only hope is that the BBC or some other channel produce a programme called "Silent Chemist", or something, which is exciting and encourages people to study chemistry. There is no proper public policy or stewardship of public finances, and they are not looking after the future graduate needs of this country.

Mr. Willis: My hon. Friend tempts me into another area, and he knows that it would be wrong of me to start making party political statements. I am sure that the Minister would not appreciate my trespassing on that territory; however, my hon. Friend's point is well made. If chemistry and the other stem subjects are important to the nation, it is important that the Government have a proper strategy to ensure the supply of chemists, physicists, mathematicians and engineers through the system. Perhaps the Minister will respond with what the Government are doing to ensure that chemistry in particular continues to underpin good forensic science in this country.

Mr. Newmark: It would be most interesting to hear from the Minister the joined-up thinking between the Home Office and the Department for Education and Skills. There seems to be no connection between the Home Office's forensic science needs and what the Department for Education and Skills proposes to do.

Mr. Willis: Again, the hon. Gentleman tries to tempt me into an area that I do not want to go into. There is a disconnection between a policy that says on the one hand that certain subjects are of strategic national and regional importance; and on the other, that we can have a market in higher education and a vice-chancellor can say, "It is better for us to have 300 English graduates than 20 or 30 chemistry graduates, because it is cheaper to run their courses." There must be something fundamentally wrong with that system.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): There is nothing wrong with an English graduate.

Mr. Willis: And there is nothing wrong with a philosophy graduate either.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): That is a matter of debate.

Mr. Willis: The hon. Gentleman tempts me to go in another direction.

Finally, I shall turn my attention to the relationship between forensic science and the courts. There has been a huge increase in the use of forensic evidence. The Forensic Science Service alone dealt with 140,000 cases in 2004–05, and its staff appeared as expert witnesses in 2,500 of those cases. In most cases, forensic evidence is non-contentious, but several recent high-profile trials, including those of Sion Jenkins and Angela Cannings, have hinged on strongly contested evidence from so-called expert witnesses. Clearly, something is wrong with the system. Are juries, judges, lawyers and experts properly equipped to do what is asked of them in such complex cases? I am sure that other hon. Members will want to take up that important question, which needs to be answered by Parliament. Indeed, should there be an alternative to the adversarial system?

When the Attorney-General, Lord Goldsmith, appeared before our Committee last November, he acknowledged that there was room for improvement, but he believed that the adversarial system provided the best safeguard against problems. However, the adversarial system is critically reliant on the ability of lawyers to test the evidence that is presented. Cases such as those of Sion Jenkins and Angela Cannings cast serious doubt on whether that is happening.

The father of DNA fingerprinting and veteran expert witness, Professor Sir Alec Jeffreys, told the Committee during its inquiry:

"I lost my faith in the adversarial legal system the first time I stood up in court".

[Mr. Willis]

He was pointing to the fact that the charisma or presentational skills of the expert, rather than the arguments that they present, is the key factor in influencing a jury.

The police and the Crown Prosecution Service have also acknowledged the importance of securing the best expert witnesses, making no bones about cherry-picking experts who go down well in court. The Committee even heard that some experts refused to appear in opposition to other experts who were deemed to be particularly powerful in their ability to perform in court. It is astoundingly complacent of the Government to think that that situation is acceptable and leads to good justice.

To be fair, the Attorney-General's new guidance for expert witnesses and the increasing use of pre-trial meetings to identify areas of genuine disagreement between experts before the arguments are rehearsed in front of a jury is welcome, but it does not go far enough. Nor does it address the concerns of many expert witnesses who increasingly feel that it is they who are on trial.

I hope that the Minister will say what steps the Government have taken to restore expert witnesses' confidence in the courts system following the public vilification of Roy Meadow, and to remedy the shortage of expert witnesses willing to give evidence, particularly in the paediatric specialities. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) wishes to catch your eye on that issue, Mr. Pope.

I shall deal with the input of scientific evidence into the legal system. It is up to the judge to determine whether an expert witness is needed, whether an expert is suitably qualified to give evidence and whether an expert is straying outside their area of expertise under questioning in court. However, the Committee found that training given to judges on forensic evidence was sporadic and far from comprehensive. Furthermore, there is no compulsory training for lawyers in forensic techniques. It is therefore easy to see how serious mistakes can be made in dealing with expert evidence. Professor Sir Alec Jeffreys told the Committee of the tension created by the "fundamental gulf between the philosophy of science and the philosophy of law".

Michael Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman mentions a witness who gave evidence to the Committee. Earlier, he mentioned that the Government ask what concerns innocent people should have if they are on the DNA database, yet the same witness pointed out that there can be inaccuracies, albeit that that is highly unlikely, with a 10-marker system. He recommended that there be a 16-marker system for DNA. Does that not demonstrate the hon. Gentleman's point? Lawyers and, indeed, politicians are often unable to take into account the probabilities or possibilities of evidence being accurate or inaccurate and the evidence or possibility of certain things happening or not happening. Those assessments are often not able to be calculated.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and I am sure that he will elaborate on that point when he makes his contribution. There are two fundamental problems. The first relates to the evidence. Clearly, there will be different interpretations of the forensic evidence. Fingerprints are a classic example. Professor Sir Alec Jeffreys made that point, which is why there was a recommendation to go to significantly greater numbers of markers. Forensic evidence techniques are developing and becoming more sophisticated all the time. That is one area in which there can be a genuine division of opinion between expert witnesses.

The other point is about the ability of a judge and particularly of leading barristers to be able to interpret the expert evidence being given and to present it to a jury. That is the second area of concern on which we are trying to get the Government to act. Professor Sir Alec Jeffreys makes a serious and worrying accusation.

The Committee recommended creating a science and law forum to promote mutual understanding between scientists and lawyers and to enable scientists to have greater input into the legal process. We still await a response from the Government on that. The Minister promised to write after the evidence session in November, so we look forward to hearing his comments today.

The Committee was critical of the absence of an agreed protocol for deciding whether evidence generated using a particular scientific technique is scientifically valid. That is the point to which the hon. Member for Lichfield alluded. I ask the Minister whether it can be in the interests of justice that a judge, with no scientific training, has responsibility for deciding whether to admit complex scientific evidence. That is a real issue and I hope that when the Minister responds to the point, he will contemplate carefully what has been said. There is not a scientist in the land who would not, if he wanted legal advice, go to a good lawyer, but the reverse does not seem to be the case. Surely the UK should have a gatekeeping test for expert evidence to provide a more independent and scientifically based means of making such decisions. Perhaps the Minister will give us a definitive response today to that recommendation.

Even if the Committee's recommendations about the training of the judiciary and trial barristers were accepted, the question whether trial by jury is the best way to obtain justice in cases involving complex and contradictory forensic evidence must be addressed. Most of us consider trial by jury to be sacrosanct, and with good reason. However, key players in the system have started to question publicly the wisdom of current arrangements.

The chairman of the Criminal Cases Review Commission, Professor Graham Zellick, recently said of the complex and conflicting evidence given in shaken baby cases:

"I would be profoundly unhappy to come to firm conclusions on those sorts of conflicts of evidence".

Where does it leave the average juror if a man of such prominence makes that statement? As Professor Zellick points out:

"The fact is we are now asking juries to decide things for which they were never designed".

The Committee did not advocate following the route of complex fraud trials, but it recommended that the Home Office should undertake research to understand how juries respond to complex scientific evidence. The Contempt of Court Act 1981 forbids jury research, and the Government recently squandered an opportunity to amend that Act to make provision for jury research. Relying simply on hearsay to determine whether the system is working is not good enough. We need to understand how complex expert evidence impacts on a jury and to find the best ways to help juries to undertake their task.

It is surprising and regrettable that a Government who claim to be committed to evidence-based policy making have been so reluctant to gather data in that area. The Government need to have the courage to ask whether trial by jury is always the best means of securing justice. An exception is already made for lengthy and complex fraud cases because the burden on the jury is seen to be unreasonably great. Why should the same principle not apply to other complex cases? If the Government have set their mind against going in that direction, surely they must explore alternative measures to assist the jury in its task. Professor Zellick has argued that a judge supported by specialist assessors should hear the expert evidence and then direct the jury on its implications. Other possibilities include the use of specialist lawyers or judges.

This issue will not go away. Forensic science is not only here to stay, its capabilities will increase as it spreads into new, even more complex areas. The system already shows strain in cases where views of forensic and medical experts are pitted against each other, and things will only get worse. How confident is the Minister that the criminal justice system is equipped for the likely rise in the number and complexity of cases that rely on forensic evidence?

It would be wrong to be alarmist about the scale of the problem, especially as the Government's aversion to research in this area means that we do not have any reliable data on how widespread problems with expert evidence are. It was interesting that Lord Goldsmith's decision following the Cannings trial to review all infant death cases resulted in only three being referred to the Court of Appeal. That said, the cost even of isolated failures could be extremely high: the financial cost of retrials can be significant—it cost £10 million to retry Sion Jenkins—and the human cost can be immeasurable, but perhaps the most important cost is the damage to public confidence in our legal system.

The Home Secretary recently seemed to acknowledge disadvantages in the UK adversarial approach, as compared with the French inquisitorial-style system. I understand why the Government might not have the appetite for wholesale reform of the legal system, despite their enthusiasm for public sector reform, but they have a duty to take seriously the concerns that we raise.

I wish to thank my predecessors for drawing attention to such a critical issue through their report. I thank the Ministers who came before the Select Committee last November and acknowledged the role that it had played in catalysing dialogue between Departments. It is all too easy to underestimate the role that science plays in the criminal justice system, as was, perhaps, reflected in the non-existent profile of the Home Office chief scientific adviser during the Committee's inquiry. We hope that in future science and scientists will be able to take their rightful place in discussions. I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply.

3.2 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): First, may I make my apologies for having to leave before the sitting finishes? Ironically, I shall be comparing the role of Select Committees in this Parliament with their role in the Canadian Parliament, which draws on scientists and others, and in the United States, which has Congressmen and senators. The meeting is in Sussex, so I have to get down there to explain just how good this Select Committee is and has been.

This is another excellent report. It has fanned the flames, or lit the fire, on many issues. The Committee's position was established with the open access inquiry. I noted yesterday that the European Parliament said that we were spot-on in making all information accessible to people. That has put mud in the eye of Reed Elsevier and other publishers that believe that they are the only organisations that have the right to publish things.

The Committee has also done some sterling work on international development by showing the role of science and technology in the developing world. The Department for International Development discovered at a Committee sitting that the need for scientific advice was staring them in the face and appointed an adviser—that was probably the first such incident but hopefully not the last.

I wish to speak generally about forensic science, which involves many different individuals and agencies in research and development and in promoting understanding of the role of forensic science in the criminal justice system. Different agencies and people working together is probably the hardest act to follow—one has only to ask Sir Alex Ferguson about melding 11 supremely talented individuals into one unit. We should not be too unhappy with suggestions that that will not happen immediately and that it will take a great deal of work. That certainly is the case in this field.

Forensic science is an ever-expanding area, as we have just heard. Many private and public bodies interact with the political process: the Home Office and its Forensic Science Service, academics, research students, scientists, medics, social commentators trying to unravel the details of scientific investigations of crime, and educational and judicial practitioners. It is a busy, high-octane field and very difficult sometimes to unravel.

The report has made a dent in the situation and illustrates the problems, which are being spoken of in professional societies. Last summer, I journeyed to Lincoln to speak about the issue at a conference of forensic practitioners. The meeting took place on the day of the London bombings, and the people there knew immediately that it was not an electrical fault that caused the disastrous events that occurred one after the other. It was interesting that some of them disappeared because they had to help out with the analysis of the situation.

The report will be debated by practitioners at two other high-octane meetings, at which the Home Office will be represented. That is the level of seriousness with which the report is being taken, and the Committee—the previous one and this one—should be congratulated on its work.

Forensic science does more than provide science and technological evidence. I want to spend a few minutes on a high-profile case that was illustrated in The Guardian this week. We have heard how blood spattered on to clothes in the Jenkins case. The question was not just that blood came from an individual, and therefore the accused was guilty, but how it got there, and how it was identified at the scene of the crime whether it got there by, for example, exhalation. One must consider every aspect and not just make the obvious assumption. It is a difficult arena.

I know well the case of O. J. Simpson, the famous quarterback. Footprints and forensic and other evidence were against him, yet, in the eyes of many people who thought that he must be guilty, he managed to escape the system.

The case I want to illustrate is one that happened in Kilmarnock in my home country, Scotland. A police constable was accused of murdering a woman. Her fingerprint—I believe that it was a thumb print—matched a mark on a windowsill inside the house, according to the Scottish forensic fingerprint division. The PC, who was 35 at the time, protested her innocence. She said that she had never been in the house and worried that she might have been sleepwalking or that she had handled the wood that was used to make the windowsill. Through an internet site, she managed to contact two American experts who came to Scotland, looked at the two fingerprints and immediately said that they were not from the same person. One had been amplified, and there was a little correlation, but they were not the same. That PC's life has been destroyed, and now a famous QC in this country is calling for a public inquiry into the organisation in Scotland that carried out the test. Nobody suffered for it; no blame was attached. As we heard, the feeling of confidence, which is affected by high-profile cases, is important.

As I know from science and technological matters, one needs only one piece of bad evidence, or one media story, to destroy a whole field of study. A case such as that one could set back many years the studies that are being done in forensic science, which I shall discuss later.

Incidentally, the person who was subsequently charged and put inside also got off on the basis that, on second examination, the fingerprints were not exactly the same. That was another irony in the case.

The woman was given £750,000. The question must be asked whether she would have received compensation if the grounds for compensation were reviewed. I believe I understand, but I am not sure that the public do, whether offering evidence in an appeal that the fingerprints were not the same would allow compensation to be paid.

I use that case not as an example in the dramatic sense favoured by the media to illustrate that the system is rotten, but to get the message across that it is necessary to be absolutely impeccable. The practitioners who carry out the work must have confidence that they have the support of the system, and should not be pressurised for particular results at a particular time just to please someone in high places. People will know what I mean when I say that.

Scientific forensic evidence is not everything; the interpretation of it is another factor. When considering the probability of something happening, it is always possible to find two people who will argue about that probability. That is no exact science either. I have just been involved in a case of oesophageal cancer in Norfolk, in Norwich, and Sir Liam Donaldson tells me that the numbers are no good for the broad statistical analysis we have. We have to go to Imperial college, which will carry out a small-level statistical survey. It is quite a sophisticated process considering cadmium exuding from aeroplanes and how biological agents may traverse a county to cause oesophageal cancer. To find out that sort of epidemiological stuff means a lot of argument about probability and requires a lot of correlations. To me, such scientific and technological evidence never seems as pure as people often believe it to be.

There are serious implications for court cases. Questions about accreditation and quality assurance are mentioned in the report. If we are to raise public confidence, we must know that such processes are being considered. We must remember, too, that a Select Committee can do only a certain amount of work in a certain amount of time in a complex field and I am sure that it would not pretend to have all the answers.

It is important to build a reliable, independent service where people are not pressurised, but are credited, given time to look at things and unstressed. They must be able to gather evidence to make a fair assessment and judgment of what might have happened at the crime scene or wherever. In this country, my model is that of the Food Standards Agency. Yes, it is criticised a little, but its independence and ability to stand up, give evidence and say what it thinks independently without interference is extremely important. It might be a model for us to take into consideration.

I am also thinking of all the different experts, expertises and professionals involved in such analysis. For example, there is not just one type of chemist, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) knows—there are analytical chemists, physical chemists and synthetic chemists, all of whom can be involved in a particular crime scene analysis. Medical students, cell biologists and biochemists, such as Sir Alec Jeffreys, or companies that they own will be involved. Anyone who tries to get all those people to agree on anything deserves a Nobel prize in their own right. It may be necessary to talk to people at Porton Down, or experts in photonics integration—I shall not go into all the technical details. At Ipswich, they have photonics integration experts, as they do in Slough. I did not know this until recently, but they are involved indirectly in analyses of things at crime scenes.

Samples travel very slowly from here to there to be analysed, and we are moving fast as regards the practicalities of that situation. My gosh, DNA-based analysis has revolutionised how we deal with crime scenes and other things as well, such as paternity. It has been very important, but as someone who has been involved a little in DNA analysis in the running of gels, I know it is not 100 per cent. pure art either. It is possible to deploy techniques once, twice, thrice or four times and get different answers each time. In identification situations, people are identified according to three or four bands and sometimes those bands are spurious, but sometimes they are not. The analysis has to be repeated and must be carried out by people who are not continually pressurised to get the result someone might be seeking at that moment.

We are moving to a situation where analysis can be carried out at the site of the crime itself through the use of a chip, sample extraction, amplifying segments and concentration in order to separate the fragments. It is possible to get an answer within about half an hour.

Dr. Iddon: Does my hon. Friend agree that instant on-site analysis has one benefit? At the moment the defence may try to imply that evidence has been contaminated on removal from the scene because it has gone through the hands of various people into the laboratory, or perhaps between laboratories. The same accusations cannot be made of analysis made instantly on the site.

Dr. Gibson: I accept that point and thank my hon. Friend for it. We are not saying that such contamination is deliberate; accidental contamination can take place. I remember that it was necessary to carry out some of these techniques in a microbiology-free atmosphere because one's own DNA could get into the sample and interfere with it without one knowing. A person could simply touch something and a bit of DNA could move out of their body into the sample, messing the whole thing up.

We are talking about an example of multidisciplinary research at its best. Funnily enough, crime has broken the back of the insularity we see in universities. I am not too worried about the million courses that there are in universities because I do not mind if law students are taught a bit of biology. I do not mind if chemists, biologists and law students go through similar courses in different departments. Breaking down the departmental insularity—the ghettoism—in universities is extremely important. Reading between the lines of the Chancellor's recent Budget, I believe he recognised that it is important to do that by making research councils merge and amalgamate their programmes' work. We need to forget about the old words we were brought up with and remember that science has moved on.

The poor judicial system will have to make judgments on the basis of all the complex interactions that are going on, with a widening repertoire of evidence coming in. I rue the day when court cases consist of scientists slugging it out. I have been at too many academic conferences where scientists love slugging it out—no two people will ever agree with each other. There must be some parameters to determine how much evidence is needed, how much has been repeated and how many laboratories we have to interact with in order to get the evidence. There is a lot to be done in that area.

We have a new policing system. We have intelligence-led policing, forensic awareness training programmes, crime scene examiners and all the new legislation, including the Criminal Justice Act 2003, the Identity Cards Bill and the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005. There is also the compensatory scheme that I mentioned, all of which are part and parcel of the application of forensic science in order to get a better understanding of what goes on in particular circumstances.

We need a collective economic assessment of the value of some of these technologies and what we get out of them. There is to be a new level 2 of the national DNA database, which we have heard about. There are going to be new fingerprint identification systems. I always prefer footprints and the patterns on those to fingerprints, but their use has not been extended to the extent it has in the New Zealand system, for example. Lots of new technologies are coming through. There will be more higher education courses and forensic science will move from DNA technology to RNA technology and protein technology. Then we will really get into it.

3.19 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.34 pm

On resuming—

Dr. Gibson: I shall bring my remarks to a hasty end in the next few minutes. There is a complex interrelationship between science and technology, and public policy, policing, investigatory practice, the arena of the courtroom and so on. It is essential that forensic science develops in that social environment, but I am not sure that we have yet addressed that problem as much as we ought to have. The authority of the science must be associated with the organisational identities of the different bodies in our country and the social imperatives in our culture. Forensic science will need a wider correlation with political, economic, social, technological and legal events.

We need a deeper analysis of the role of the Home Office, ACPO and the Forensic Science Service, where we identified different patterns of management. We need to get those bodies working together on a broader basis. If we are to get the high profile that we want from the report in the criminal justice system and if forensic science is to play its part, I have a feeling that we are going to need a much stronger and longer inquiry, to bring together all the problems that have been identified in one place. The bodies involved in that might want to consider how they handle such interactions. I do not think for a minute that the Committee said that it had all the answers or that it knew what structures should develop. It is for the practitioners to address those issues.

Forensic science will obviously play an increasing role in crime detection, with all the new technologies and discoveries that are coming along. It will be much more important, so we shall have to take it much more seriously and get those interactions going. For example, we could start with the current concern in society about the ethics of scientific research and accountability. By that I do not just mean animal experiments, but the issue of the ethical interaction of society with scientific and technological discoveries. That is a new field that we have not yet hit, and professional groups make a mistake if they do not recognise that public concern about the ethical and moral questions is part and parcel of those interactions and of understanding the role that forensic science is going to play.

We could make a good start by thinking about that and getting some ethicists. One can find medical ethicists on every street corner these days—the fastest-growing profession in Britain. There is big money involved. A quarter of a million? That is nothing to the medical ethicists—they start at £500,000 these days to tell people how they should think about morality, philosophy and so on. That is an important job to turn to, should a Member lose their seat. [Interruption.] Sorry, did the Minister wish to take the job?

There will be huge debates about ethics. The core structures in universities will need to be handled, which will require vice-chancellors to get moving and to think how multidisciplinary interaction could take place. I do not decry Amanda Burton. I do not decry some interaction between departments with the word "forensic" in the title, but it has to be meaningful. Such interaction need not always be vocational, but it will have to be considered in those terms as well just because there are not that many jobs around—there are perhaps more forensic practitioners than we need in our society. There is a huge problem.

I finish with what I think is a deeply interesting point, which is international collaboration. For example, the other night, I saw something about how substances would be detected in the underground in Washington and New York, which one of our reports said that we knew. That has been developed over there, so that a terrorist attack involving sarin, of the sort that happened in Tokyo, could be tackled in those major cities, yet London Underground refused to handle that new technology. That is part and parcel of science and technology inputting into the changes in our society and of recognising that it has a part to play. That is where interaction—in the Home Office, between Departments and among different scientifically trained people, thinkers, commentators and ethicists—could help to make the enterprise a jewel in this country and benefit not only crime detection but our anti-terrorism policy and the prevention of such incidents.

Now is an exciting time to be a forensic scientist. I hope that this Parliament will continue the fight to ensure that they are listened to, that more of them are trained, that we give them the opportunity to develop and that they are not hidden away in funny departments, but come out and become the Amanda Burtons of the future.

3.39 pm

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): I shall focus on three areas. My first concern is the move to a public-private partnership. Coming from an ex-businessman and a Conservative, that may be surprising, but I do not particularly want to see the privatisation of these services. In the words of the Science and Technology Committee, because of their record the Government do not "inspire confidence" in their ability to make a success of the Forensic Science Service as a PPP. We should also be sceptical about tinkering with an essential public service, which does much to underpin our criminal justice system. That reason, as much as the first, is one of my primary objections to privatisation of the service.

The second area is science as a marketplace. I remain unconvinced that there is a viable market for forensic science services or that the benefits outweigh the costs to the public. That is because of the need for regulation, the need to ensure low cost, the need for access to services, the need to ensure consistent service—and the risk of failure, which was alluded to earlier.

My third concern is that of education and training, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis). The Committee estimated that more than 400 courses on forensic sciences are run by 57 universities. The Committee recommended that action be taken to improve standards of training and to establish links between forensic science and chemistry departments. The Government have not done enough to ensure that that is happening, a connection that I mentioned earlier. We still hear of the closure of chemistry departments, which has been the subject of debate many times over the past few months.

The first issue is tackling public-private partnerships. The McFarland review reached the conclusion that

"by becoming private sector classified the FSS would acquire the private sector flexibilities it desires, and the Government would be relieved of responsibility for a commercial operation, as well as partly realising its investment."

I have several objections to that conclusion. The first is the belief that the Forensic Science Service should, as a matter of principle, remain in the public sector and be subject to full parliamentary oversight. The second is the possibility of failure. In light of the Government's poor track record in managing PPP projects, it is an unacceptable risk to an essential service that underpins much of the criminal justice system.

The Minister said during a follow-up sitting that "my straight answer to you is yes; that no irrevocable decision has been taken with regard to any further development following PPP. It is my intention, and that of the Home Secretary, that the GovCo structure should be given an opportunity to succeed in its own right."

I hope that he will keep to his word. He echoed the Government's response to the Committee's report, which stated that

"no irrevocable decision about the future shape and direction of the organisation will be made until at least December 2006."

However, as our report identified, there have been no straight answers and no consistent policy since the McFarland review in 2003.

The review suggested the radical measure of a transfer of forensic science services to the private sector, yet the future of the FSS is still in limbo. I am still sceptical of the Government's commitment to the GovCo, given the relatively limited time that it has had to prove itself. Our report also recommended that the Government make public the specific criteria that will be used to evaluate the success of the GovCo and the need for progression to PPP. I welcome the Government's response that "in the interests of transparency, careful consideration will be given to which information it would be appropriate to place in the public domain"

However, I ask the Minister to bring us all up to date on the criteria that will be used and on the progress of the assessment in general.

Leaving aside for a moment the Government's misleading and confusing presentation on the decision to move from a GovCo to PPP, we remain sceptical of the rationale for the move itself. It is not known whether the provision of forensic science will benefit from a competitive market. The Minister was hardly any more reassuring when, giving evidence, he said:

"I do not think that there should be room for others to come into the market."

It does not sound like a marketplace to me.

The fact remains that opinion on the subject is sharply divided, and that there is little or no evidence in favour of the move beyond the general principle that competition in the marketplace is beneficial. However, we must continue to ask whether the provision of forensic science services falls firmly in the category of a natural monopoly. Furthermore, even if it can be shown that services will benefit from competition, will the benefits be outweighed by the need for heavy and invasive regulation of an essential public service? A degree of price control will be required to ensure that users like the police have ready, reliable and affordable access to services. Is that compatible with a competitive market?

The Government's response stated:

"A strategic analysis of the market that draws on the lessons from the early pilot areas and informs the evolution of the tendering strategy is planned."

It is not clear whether that analysis will have finished, or even have commenced, by December 2006, which is the date for commencing further discussion on the proposed transfer to a full PPP. The Government's strategy in that respect is unsound in principle; from their track record on PPP, it is likely to be unsound in practice.

Finally, I turn to education and training. The Government have not given enough credence to the Committee's recommendations on the provision of forensic science education and training. We estimated that more than 400 courses are offered by 57 universities, and we highlighted our concern about their standards and the lack of remedial action from the Government. We said:

"It is disappointing that, in view of the concerns expressed to us by the police and the wider forensic science community over standards in forensic science education, the Home Office has taken no action to communicate the existence of these problems to colleagues at DfES."

One of our most important recommendations was that

"the Forensic Science Society, SEMTA and the main employers work together with the Royal Society of Chemistry to promote an understanding of the value of chemistry as a route into forensic science."

However, the Government still decline to take the lead. Their response was not only anodyne, but abdicated responsibility for the maintenance of high-quality forensic science training and more generally for the promotion of science education. In other words, the Government have simply passed the buck to the Royal Society of Chemistry by saying that it should

"as the professional body . . . take the lead."

The Government have pledged to contact the royal society, but meanwhile award-winning chemistry departments like the one at Sussex university are still being forced to close.

I was also concerned that, given the increasingly important role of forensic science to the criminal justice system, there is no compulsory training. The Judicial Studies Board and the Bar Council are left to arrange training on an ad hoc basis. That seems to be another abdication of responsibility by the Government. I was unconvinced by Lord Goldsmith's reply—the Attorney-General—when giving evidence that "the DCA are discussing with the professional bodies whose responsibility it is to train lawyers whether part of the compulsory continuing professional development ought to include this aspect and those discussions are going on."

We ought by now to know the outcome of those discussions. More important, they should not be discussions: the Government should be taking a clear lead on the level of forensic science training required by the legal profession. It is clear to me that there is no lead at all, much less a clear one. I look forward to the Minister's response.

3.49 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I have a feeling of déjà vu, because my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) secured a debate on forensic science on 18 October last year, in which I made a contribution. However, more Members will be able to take part in this afternoon's debate. I am pleased to see so many Members in the Chamber, and will try not to repeat my previous contribution.

I shall comment first on the proposal in the 2003 McFarland report that the Forensic Science Service should proceed through being a GovCo to become a Public-Private Partnership. According to the report, the PPP should be established 12 to 18 months after the GovCo. It seems that we are trying to create an artificial market, which will achieve nothing. I shall try to elaborate on that.

The Forensic Science Service Trading Fund (Revocation) Order 2005 was debated on 14 December. In a recent written statement, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), made it clear that

"FSS Ltd must be allowed to establish its viability as a GovCo."—[Official Report, 29 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 68–9WS.]

He went on to say that it would be converted into a PPP only if there were "convincing reasons" for that change. I welcomed that statement, because I would like the GovCo to be given the chance to settle down and prove itself before we rush into the next step proposed by the McFarland report.

The Government have rightly reasoned that the FSS needs massive investment to be able to compete in a market that is becoming more competitive—not only in this country, but throughout the world. It is a globally developing market. Britain's FSS is and always has been one of the finest in the world. I am sure that all Members present want to keep it that way. As a university chemistry teacher, I have an indirect interest in the forensic science services, because quite a number of my students have entered forensic science as a career.

As well as examining whether the Government's plans for the FSS are appropriate, the Science and Technology Committee examined the supply of graduates and the presentation of forensic evidence in court. If I had to write the headlines regarding our Committee's inquiry, they would say that the police should have access to forensic science and not be inhibited by high prices, that the forensic science services should, as they do, prefer to recruit people from the physical sciences, particularly physics and chemistry, and that we need to pay far more attention to the way in which all evidence, but especially forensic evidence, is presented by expert witnesses in court.

The Government recently published a written statement in which they set out the four sets of criteria that need to be met. The first is that the needs of the UK criminal justice service should be considered, which is pretty obvious. Secondly, the Government should seek assurance that a competitive marketplace will develop for forensic science services, about which I am concerned. I think that they might want more competition in order to drive down prices as a cost-saving measure. Obviously, things might not go that way; they might go the other way, with higher prices being introduced.

Thirdly, the FSS needs to improve its accommodation and provide state-of-the-art facilities for its work. As a chemist, I know that simply replacing one fume cupboard involves a massive cost for a service or university. To replace a whole suite of fume cupboards, which are necessary in the forensic science services, requires huge investment. Many of the FSS's buildings are out of date, and some might need to be rebuilt. I do not have enough information on that.

Fourthly, in coming to a decision on the FSS's conversion from GovCo to PPP, the Government will have to consider their needs as a shareholder. If money is lost, they will have a problem.

Obviously, I wish the FSS well, particularly in its GovCo capacity, but I urge the Minister to consider that short period of its conversion from GovCo to PPP. All of us who met FSS staff when the announcements were made following the McFarland report know that the morale of the service slumped at that time. A number of people left the service, and quite a number probably did not enter it because they wanted to enter a public service, and it was clear that it was not going to be a public service. The FSS was in a state of turmoil. Anyone who has worked in such an organisation knows that they take some time to recover. We are expecting not only that it will recover, but that FSS Ltd. should be successful as a half-privatised service. I ask the Minister to give it a little longer than 18 months to prove itself as a GovCo.

If the costs of forensic science services in a competitive environment in which there are few players are driven up rather than down, there is a danger that the police might not have as free an access to those services as they do now, and that fewer samples will be submitted for forensic investigation. That would be to the detriment of justice, but I am concerned that that might happen if prices go the wrong way.

What about the artificial market that I mentioned? Who are its competitors? When the announcement was first made, we had the Laboratory of the Government Chemist Group Holdings plc, but we must remember that the LGC has gone through the same process. It is now a private company, but it once had a strong public sector ethos. The only other major competitor when the announcement was made was Forensic Alliance, but it has now combined its forensic services with the LGC. Therefore, there is only one effective competitor in this country. That is artificial competition, which will not work.

For there to be a free market and competition, there have to be many players in the market. A number of smaller companies are emerging in the marketplace, but they are niche companies. There is one such company in my constituency called Zentek Forensics Ltd., which specialises in a newly emerging area called digital forensics. I spoke to that company earlier today about competition and my belief that it is artificial. It said, "You are probably right Brian, because, as well as the main competitor, if you ignore one-man outfits, you can probably count the number of small companies trying to emerge into this market on one hand." Zentek told me that there are only five or six of them. That might be a low figure, but the number is certainly not much higher.

Zentek Forensics is trying to win contracts with police forces, which are put under more and more pressure as digital crime increases. One reason for that is because of initiatives such as Operation Ore, through which we are trying to pin down all the paedophiles in the world. We know that that is a complex racket, with people downloading nasty images of children from the internet. I have been to Europol in The Hague and seen the Europol side of Operation Ore. The operation is terribly complex: all the raids have to be made at the same time in the morning, otherwise the rest of the network is informed. Electricity to houses has to be switched off and computers have to be captured. It is very complex and involves police forces across Europe, certainly, and the rest of the world. The police cannot cope with the numbers of computers that they capture, the number of hard discs that have to be carefully analysed, and the amount of information that has to be provided for evidence in court.

Zentek Forensics has realised that that niche market is worth entering, and has done so. I am proud to announce—the Minister will be interested to know this—that it has just won a major contract with the Greater Manchester police, which is one of the largest police forces in the country, by open tender. However, it took that small, emerging enterprise, which employs only a handful of people, 14 months to win the tender, which was costly. It underwent a rigorous test of its work, procedures, staff and premises to make sure that such a small company was up to the job. Even its technical competence was tested by the Greater Manchester police in a written examination. Altogether, it took 14 months for that small enterprise to emerge into the so-called competitive forensic market.

I tell that story not only to show how hard it is to emerge in that artificial market that I described, but to point out that if Zentek Forensics Ltd wanted to bid for a contract with another major police force, such as West Midlands or Merseyside, and had to go through that procedure again, it would be bankrupted. The process has cost it a lot of money already. The market needs—if market it is—a regulator. Quality forensic services have to be provided, whoever provides them; we have to make sure that the evidence going to court is of the highest quality. In my estimation, if we are to have a free market in forensics, we need a regulator to make sure that all the things that we want happen.

As the Chairman of our Select Committee pointed out, one of our strong recommendations was to set up a forensic science advisory council, which would oversee the regulation of the science market. I strongly support that, as hon. Members may gather from what I have said. In view of my remarks, will my hon. Friend the Minister update us on the progress, as he sees it, from the FSS to GovCo, and particularly from GovCo to a public-private partnership?

Much has already been said about forensic science degree courses. Of course, it is the glamour of the subject that allows it to be displayed throughout the media—on television, on the radio and in novels by the thousand. It captures the imagination of millions of not only young people, but older people across the world. We all watch programmes such as "Silent Witness". My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North, called the glamour of forensic science "the Amanda Burton factor", and he is right.

When we produced our report, we did not pay enough courtesy to a report published by the sector skills council for science, engineering and manufacturing technologies, or SEMTA for short. It published its report entitled "Forensic Science: Implications for Higher Education 2004" for the Higher Education Funding Council and the learning and teaching support network for physical science. It was commissioned "in response to employers' concerns that young people could well derive false expectations in terms of realistic employment opportunities" if they studied forensic science at some universities. According to that report, when it was produced there were 50 degree programmes and more than 350 course combinations involving forensic science.

We heard from the Chairman of the Select Committee how rapidly the number of universities providing forensic science courses, and the number of course combinations, has increased. He was right to point out some of the ridiculous course combinations offered. Forensic science and music has not been mentioned; nor has religion and culture with forensic biology. It seems that any student can think of a course, turn to a document that lists courses, and just choose what turns them on.

Hard science departments continue to close, one of the latest being that in Sussex university. That, we are told, is due partly to a lack of students. However, we are told by the Under-Secretary of State for Science and Innovation that the overall number of students opting to study science is holding up. He is right, and that is due to the popularity of what we sometimes call sexy subjects, such as astronomy and forensic science. We could debate all day whether an over-production of forensic scientists is a good or bad thing. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North, is not worried about that over-production.

Michael Fabricant: I was slightly astonished to hear the hon. Gentleman say that astronomy is a sexy subject. St. Andrews university and several others would say that astronomy was a serious subject, although I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. Did he in fact mean astrology?

Dr. Iddon: No, no, I meant astronomy. The Select Committee discovered that the number of astronomy degree courses has grown astronomically, if I may use the word.

I do not want to dwell on this next point, because it is a debate for another day, but the Royal Society of Chemistry, of which I am a fellow—I admit that interest—has just looked into eight chemistry departments, including one that is world famous. The report does not name it, so I shall not do so, but anyone who knows anything about the subject can pick out which one it is if they read the report. The Royal Society of Chemistry concluded that not one of the departments, including one that gets loads of money from the dual funding system, is paying its way. The line is red at the bottom of the accounts for all eight departments.

The message to the Government is clear, and we will give it to them on another occasion: frankly, science departments are not funded as well as they should be. That is the second main reason why physics departments, as well as some other science departments, are closing. The issue is not just the shortage of students; it is that departments are not well enough funded, at a time when the Government are pouring money into science. It is ironic that the Government are committing more and more money to science, yet we are closing the research institutes of the research councils on the one hand, and science departments are being closed on the other. How can that be? I will continue to ask that question of our Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Science and Innovation.

Lee Chatfield is head of the department of forensic and investigative science at the university of Central Lancashire—it likes to be known as UCLAN—in Preston. He tells me that a number of the department's students are attracted to continuing their studies in a hard physical science after initially studying forensic science. Those are students who would not have done chemistry or physics or have been turned on to mathematics if they had not gone through a foundation course or a three-year BSc course in forensic science. That is a benefit arising from some, but not all, forensic science courses.

Incidentally, Lee Chatfield's first crop of graduates had no difficulty in getting jobs; they went into a number of disparate careers, but the interesting thing is that quite a number went into the police force. I have worked with the police and have seen Mr. Plod trample the evidence; it would be no bad thing if police understood how scene-of-crime officers have to collect the evidence from a crime scene, and so did not trample the evidence into the ground. Frankly, I am all in favour of more policemen and women having a knowledge of forensic science.

Here is some good news that I do not think has been widely broadcast yet. UCLAN has announced that it will reopen its degree course in chemistry in 2007, having closed it in 1999. That is the rebirth—the first one—of a chemistry department. Why is that happening? Because so many of the university's forensic science students realise that they are not going to work in forensic science laboratories unless they have some chemistry and physics knowledge, and unless they are numerate and can understand statistics. That is excellent news, and I am pleased to spread the word, although it has been announced publicly previously. UCLAN was the first university in the entire country to start a forensic science degree course in 2000. Full courses in forensic science are quite new, although modules in the subject, and MScs in forensic science—following a chemistry degree, for example—have been around since the 1990s.

[Dr. Iddon]

Let me mention briefly just some of the conclusions of the SEMTA report. The first is that forensic science courses attract a higher proportion of female students. That is no bad thing, because something that has been lacking in the hard sciences, as distinct from the life sciences, is sufficient numbers of women prepared to study physics, chemistry and mathematics. If they are proceeding into those subjects via forensic science, we ought to applaud that.

Nearly all the universities that run forensic science courses rank a chemistry A-level as a desirable entrance qualification. However, the sad thing is that two thirds of such courses take people who have no science A-level qualification. That is bad. Universities found their students lacking in practical skills and mathematical ability, another bad thing. Five of every six institutions agreed that, given the demand for them, there was an over-supply of forensic science graduates.

According to SEMTA, the most suitable occupations for forensic science graduates were analytical chemistry, laboratory analysis or police roles such as being a scene-of-crime or fingerprint officer. Although the major factor in developing forensic science courses was student interest, universities developed them to compensate for the falling demand for hard science courses, which students perceived as too demanding or not relevant to today's world; in my opinion, both perceptions are untrue.

Of all the course modules listed in the pamphlet, chemistry, biology and law were least popular, and scene-of-crime and practical work most popular. Forensic science employers have been involved in the design of some courses at some of the universities, but not all of them, unfortunately. They would like the courses to provide graduates with better presentational, computer and laboratory skills and some knowledge of biology and mathematics.

There appears to be a lack of consistency across forensic science degree courses; that point is important. Forensic science employers do not know what they will get from a given university and are calling for an accreditation system for forensic science degree courses. Such courses are young, as I have said, but such a system is long overdue. Forensic science graduates are not as attractive to other science employers, although a shortage of skills is encouraging them to recruit graduates from the forensic science market.

The SEMTA report made four recommendations: the instigation of a system of quality assurance to attest to course content and the outcomes of forensic science degree courses; an agreement on the establishment of a formal mechanism through which employers could discuss the content and outcomes of forensic science degree programmes; the establishment of world-class training programmes designed to deliver the full range of technical and/or laboratory skills required in employment in forensic science; and discussions on the nature of funding in higher education with a view to arriving at funding strategies to strengthen the science base by attracting more people to read science degrees—that is, all science degrees.

Finally, I turn to the judicial system. A number of high-profile cases have collapsed in recent years because the courts appear to have relied too much on the forensic evidence presented by so-called expert witnesses. There has been controversy about Sir Roy Meadow, whose evidence led to the conviction of Sally Clark; that case rumbles on. The cases of Sion Jenkins and Angela Cannings are still very much in the headlines. More recently, Ian Gay and his wife Angela have been released on bail, only to be told that they will be retried for the manslaughter, allegedly by an overdose of salt, of Christian Blewitt, whom they planned to adopt. The Damilola Taylor murder case has reopened, apparently because what might have been vital evidence was missed during a forensic investigation.

It appears to me that some court cases are won or lost on the basis of the evidence given in court by an expert witness. The prosecution will seek the best expert witness available; that often means, particularly given that the market is small, that the defence has to put up with somebody who is not of the same standard.

Dr. Evan Harris: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman, and I respect the points that he has made. However, he implied that Sir Roy Meadow's evidence led to Sally Clark's conviction and that the role of expert witnesses leads to miscarriages of justice. It should be noted that at the first appeal the conviction of Sally Clark was upheld, despite that evidence having been considered. The second appeal, which overthrew the conviction, rested almost entirely on the non-production of evidence from a Dr. Williams and was not related to the evidence of Sir Roy.

Dr. Iddon: I fully accept those points, and they are on the record.

I was interested to read in The Times of 7 March this year a letter written by Patrick Phillips QC:

> "If one examines early cases when 'experts' were involved, they were invariably leading (and often outstanding) practitioners. Nowadays this is rarely the case, and the 'forensic expert', who practises little but earns most of a living from giving evidence, holds sway to the detriment of the whole process".

A leading QC is concerned about how forensic evidence is presented in court and who presents it; Parliament should listen to such people, as well as to the conclusions of Committees such as ours. Most of the rest of the judicial process is under review; why cannot the way that evidence is presented in court also be reviewed?

Are judges and juries impressed by the reputation and qualifications—nay, even the charisma—of expert witnesses more than by the evidence that they present? I wonder. Do judges and juries or solicitors and barristers understand all the scientific evidence? Given the ever-accelerating pace of technology, has the time come to require training for all those involved in court practices, so that justice can be seen to be done in Britain and we can avoid the mistakes—there have been too many—that have already occurred?

Our report has attempted to answer some of those questions. We suggested that the prosecution and defence expert witnesses should always, not sometimes, meet out of court to decide on areas of agreement and disagreement. Those areas of disagreement, of course, would be debated in court, and I would fully support that.

Like our Chairman, I feel that the Government should look at the Contempt of Court Act 1981, which prevents us from carrying out research on how juries reach their decisions and whether they understand the extent of the evidence—particularly the forensic science evidence. I urge the Minister to consider amending the 1981 Act so that we can do such research.

I realise that my point is extremely controversial and would have a lot of opposition. However, if we are to know whether justice is being carried out, we need to know whether juries are being led along the right route, whether the right evidence is before them and whether one man or woman guides the rest of the jury, as can often happen. We need to know what happens within those closed four walls.

4.18 pm

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): On 17 February, I visited the scientific support unit of Northamptonshire police force. During the past year, I have had the privilege of completing a 22-day attachment with the force as part of the police parliamentary scheme. My day with the forensic science department was most illuminating. I thank Dr. John Bond, the scientific support manager, David Goodwin, the head of fingerprints, Peter Watson, the head of forensic investigation and Claire Rocks, the investigator to whom I was attached, for a most informative and illuminating day.

There are 50 forensic staff in the Northamptonshire police force. They operate on a budget of £2.5 million, and they pick up almost 50 per cent. of the relevant detections for those crimes most easily detected by forensic science. Without those people's good work there would be far more criminals at large in Northamptonshire, committing far more crimes than is currently the case.

The important point I want to contribute to this debate is that the Home Office's own data show that scientific support units are most effective when they are engaged in police forces of about 1,500 officers. My worry is that, despite all the improvements in the technical ability of forensic science in terms of fingerprinting and DNA sampling, if the intended police mergers go ahead, we could end up with fewer crimes being detected. The forces will be far larger, and therefore less effective in using fingerprint and DNA technology.

The Northamptonshire police scientific support unit was established as a result of the famous Touche Ross report of 1987, which sought to establish such units on the basis of county police forces; there was a move away from regional scientific support units. That is the opposite direction to that in which the proposed police mergers might take us. As a result of that earlier direction, fingerprint and DNA detection increased. The report's recommendation was effective—it worked.

As hon. Members know, the crime types where forensic science has the most detection potential are burglary dwellings and theft of motor vehicles. In the 12 months to the end of December 2005, in Northamptonshire, 48 per cent. of all burglary dwellings detections, 47 per cent. of all theft of motor vehicles detections and 30 per cent. of all thefts from motor vehicles detections were a direct result of fingerprint and DNA work by Northamptonshire police's scientific support unit.

That clearly demonstrates the success of, and need for, forensic science. The Home Office's own data show that, where the size of a police force is increased, the detection rates for forensic science decrease. We all know that most crime remains undetected. However, let us consider some figures relating to recorded residential burglary and theft of motor vehicles detected by DNA and fingerprinting in 2004–05. The best results in the country were achieved by forces of between 1,000 and 2,000 police officers, where some 10.5 per cent. of the overall crime in those categories was detected using DNA and fingerprinting. For the larger forces involving between 6,000 and 8,000 police officers, the figures decrease to about 3 per cent. My worry is that, if we have a similar debate in 10 years' time, the Home Office data, which we assume are right now, might show that we are detecting fewer crimes by forensic science.

I am horribly biased in my analysis because Northamptonshire police's scientific support unit is among the best in the country. It takes its work extremely seriously. Let us consider the percentage of domestic burglary crimes that were examined for fingerprints in 2005–06. Northamptonshire police and the British Transport police examined every such crime scene for fingerprints, whereas the national average was just 86 per cent. All four forces with which Northamptonshire's police force is proposed to be merged had a worse record than it did.

Let us consider the percentages of stolen vehicles examined for fingerprints and DNA by police forces in 2005–06. Northamptonshire's police managed a figure of 95 per cent., whereas the national average is 46 per cent. The four forces I mentioned again did worse. Let us consider the percentage of recorded burglary dwellings where the use of fingerprints led to the detection of a crime. The Northamptonshire force is in the upper quartile and its performance is well above the national average. Two of the forces with which it is to be merged are in the lower quartile, and so it continues.

My conclusion is that Northamptonshire's excellent scientific support unit, led by Dr. John Bond, is imperilled by the proposed police mergers. The Northamptonshire unit has also led the way in the technological development of fingerprint techniques. It played a full role in the first automated fingerprint identification system in the early 1990s. It has made full use of the first national automated fingerprint identification system, or NAFIS, and, most recently, its successor, Ident1. By this summer, Northamptonshire police will have the benefit of Livescan machines that will electronically record arrestees' fingerprints and automatically search them on the national database for proof of identity.

The National Fingerprint Board recently published data for the first quarter of this year which showed that in Northamptonshire the scientific support staff handle more cases per fingerprint expert than any other force in the country. In addition, they achieve many more identifications per fingerprint expert than the national average. The Northamptonshire force processes 120 crimes per fingerprint expert. The figures for all the forces with which it is proposed to merge are considerably worse. The figure for the Leicestershire force is 40, which is the second worst in the country.

The Northamptonshire force is also developing nanotechnology, which is the focus of a research project that it is undertaking to enhance the techniques for revealing fingerprints. Nanotechnology is likely to be one of the biggest steps forward in fingerprint technology in the past 30 years. The Northamptonshire force was also behind the last major step forward: the use of superglue vapour. I do not imagine that many people in this Chamber inhale glue vapour. However, if vapour is produced from superglue, fingerprints can be made to appear from almost nowhere. That was discovered by Northamptonshire police.

Northamptonshire's unit recently teamed up with the scientific team at St. Andrews university. Its polymer optoelectronics group is world renowned in the development of nanoparticle semiconductors. Together they are developing new techniques to make fingerprints that cannot currently be detected available for identification. The work will have a tremendous impact on enhancing fingerprints and will therefore increase fingerprint detections. If it is successful in Northamptonshire, I have no doubt that it will be rolled out throughout the country.

The Northamptonshire force has led the way in respect of success with DNA. It has been involved in the national DNA database since April 1995, and in recent months the FSS has described Northamptonshire police's DNA performance as "simply spectacular" and "amazing". Northamptonshire's success rate in obtaining DNA profiles suitable for inclusion on the national database is far higher than that of the rest of the east midlands region, with which it is now proposed that it will merge—65 per cent. in Northamptonshire, compared with 57 per cent. in the east midlands. The national figure is merely 53 per cent.

In my brief contribution to this debate, I wanted not only to bring to the House's attention the success of Northamptonshire's scientific support unit and to thank its staff for the day I spent with them, but to give a serious warning that forensic science has been overlooked in the "Closing the Gap" report produced by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. That is a serious omission. If this all goes wrong, we could end up with fewer crimes being detected as a result of forensic science because of the police mergers that the Government propose.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): May I say, Mr. Pope, what a pleasure it is to stand before you in your new august guise?

The Select Committee was stimulated in the first instance to look into forensic science by the Home Office proposals for partial privatisation. From the start, our investigation was truly fascinating because every time we turned over a stone any number of issues emerged. Many of them have been rehearsed this afternoon, and I will not repeat them all.

I shall begin by making a point that I do not think any hon. Members disagree with. The FSS is, and has been, one of the jewels in the Home Office crown, and we should think very carefully before changing it drastically, in case we damage it or reduce its future potential.

What is the imperative to go towards PPP? Like my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) I have a feeling of déjà vu, because I remember what happened to air traffic control. The case of National Air Traffic Services provides a closely comparable example. Here we had an excellent service of unquestionable quality and skills that was starved of finance—artificially in respect of NATS, because the Government were taking the money, but they were just not reinvesting properly, so they created an investment backlog. That PPP was not a signal success.

I am sorry to say that in my wardrobe I have a rack of tee-shirts to do with various issues that say "I told you so." Sometimes, I get them out and wave them about, and I think this is one such occasion. We do not want to repeat the PPP mistake with the Forensic Science Service, provided that it can succeed as a GovCo. It is vital that it is given a fair crack at doing that. It will need capital, but irrespective of whether that capital comes from a private partner or judicious borrowing, it will still have to be serviced. What is it to be serviced with? It will be serviced out of turnover. Either way, the actual impact on the revenue and on the cost of forensic science services will be little different, except that there is a strong possibility that the price will be higher if there is a private partner with the need to give profits to its shareholders. That is more likely to increase the costs to the users of forensic science than it is to diminish them. There is short-termism here; I must say that I have never been a fan of PPP in any of its guises, and that is a feature of all of them. This short-termism is extremely unfortunate because in the long term the cost to the whole country is likely to be greater.

I feel slightly worried when Opposition Members say things that I actually agree with.

Mr. Newmark: Name names.

Dr. Turner: I was about to name the hon. Gentleman. He referred to forensic science as a natural monopoly. That is true—again, just like air traffic control. Forensic science is basically a natural monopoly, although perhaps with a few niche areas around it. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East has also seriously questioned the validity of the concept of a market in forensic science services.

At present, there seems to be something slightly naive—this came across in evidence—about the Home Office intention that somehow the new PPP would bring in a lot of foreign business because it had been turned into a PPP. I doubt that. It will attract foreign custom if it offers the high-quality forensics that people need, and if it uses cutting-edge techniques. In my view, being a PPP would not help that.

I am still very worried about the Government response to our clear recommendation that the transition to PPP should not be axiomatic. The GovCo should be given an adequate chance to demonstrate its viability, and the criteria should be transparent. I am glad that the criteria have been published, although I have not seen them yet, so I cannot comment on them.

Mr. Newmark: Does the hon. Gentleman share a concern of mine, which is that the Government will be both judge and jury? We should be concerned about their setting the criteria. They will set the criteria, and then they will make a judgment on whether the forensic service should move to being a PPP.

Dr. Turner: I thank the hon. Gentleman, because I was about to make that very point. I agree: the Home Office is setting itself up as judge and jury, and executioner, all at the same time, and that is unfortunate. I hope that there will be—as mentioned in the Government response—genuine scrutiny by the National Audit Office. It is essential that there is independent scrutiny of this process, and it must be transparent.

My heart sinks slightly when I come across the usual weasel words in publications such as the Government response to the Select Committee's report. It states:

> "There is no intention to conceal any performance-related information, but it would not be reasonable to disclose any commercially sensitive information that could undermine the ability of FSS GovCo to operate competitively."

That kind of phrase covers all manner of sins. It provides the excuse of not saying anything at all. That cannot be acceptable either. I am not in commerce myself, but other hon. Members present are, and I am sure they would agree that that is not a sound principle on which to operate. It is just a bit of a cover-up. I am not in any way blaming my hon. Friend the Minister, but it is a smokescreen behind which civil servants are happy to hide. There must be transparency in the judgment process. Even if the timetable were extended until the summer of next year, it would still be an unrealistically short period in which to judge the performance of a complex operation. It needs at least two years of annual operating and financial results.

Dr. Iddon: And some investment.

Dr. Turner: There needs to be an investment plan now, because without investment, the company would have no chance at all of delivering the goods. It would be like asking it to run the 100 m with a ball and chain around its legs. That would not do any of us any good, least of all forensic science and the criminal justice system. Adequate time must be given, and there must be an investment plan now, not later. We do not know what investment there will be.

Mr. Newmark: I am curious. If the service remains a GovCo, and it does not undergo transition to a full PPP, does the hon. Gentleman believe that a forensic science advisory council will still be necessary? Would he still want to follow up that recommendation from the Committee?

Dr. Turner: Yes. Even if we remain with a GovCo, we still have something of a market. Many other aspects—many of which have been aired this afternoon—require the attention of a regulator. Unlike the normal regulation of a market, there are serious issues of scientific quality in this area, and there is no arbiter or authority to keep a check on them. I would go further than the report, and suggest that one role of the regulator—the advisory council, which needs to be a highly qualified body—would be to maintain a high level of scientific quality throughout the criminal justice system. There is an important role for a regulator in any event. I hope it is clear that I do not wish to see the introduction of PPP. I am convinced that, properly supported, the GovCo can work very well. But it must be properly supported.

I turn to the national DNA database and other databases. I, too, have been concerned about the ease with which a young person can find themselves DNA tested and put on the database without ever having been cautioned, charged or anything. Such practice approaches the edge of a serious civil liberties issue, and I should like the Minister to address it. There is no control over the police in this matter. Are they simply on a stamp-collecting exercise, whereby any young person who comes to their attention automatically goes on to the database, so that they have lots of reference material when hunting for villains? If so, I agree with the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant). He said that if we want the police to do that, Parliament should be the body that decides it, not the police of their own volition.

We do not yet have any certainty about the future ownership and control of either the DNA or other databases. Control and ownership will have to be removed from the Forensic Science Service, even with its transition to a GovCo. Will the Minister provide us with some further information about what the Government have in mind for the long-term future of the control and ownership of the databases? That is absolutely fundamental.

We have said much about training, and I fully endorse it. The chemistry department under threat of closure at my local university, the university of Sussex, is an excellent department. We may yet save it, but we shall see. Its life would have been made much easier if prospective students who wanted to work in forensic science were aware that their best way in is to do a proper chemistry or physics degree. Do a serious science degree, and then top it up with some postgraduate training—boom! Doing one of the 455 Mickey Mouse degrees that, if one wants to enter forensic science, are on a par with a degree in media studies, is a total waste of time. It defrauds students and it does a disservice to the reputation of universities if they pander to the market in that facile way.

It would help if the Government and forensic science associations made it clear to students what were the best career and qualification paths for entering forensic science. It would encourage recruitment into serious science departments. There should be not only accredited degrees, but recognised and accredited qualifications for entering the profession and becoming a registered practitioner. Regulation is needed, and it could form part of the work of the independent regulator, if established. A very useful service would be created.

Research and development is not financed clearly, nor is it subject to any clear strategy. It would be most unfortunate if FSS, as a GovCo or in whatever form, were not at the cutting edge because there was not enough research and development in forensic science. Encouraging the "forensification"—that dreadful word that we heard in evidence to the Committee—of techniques for use in the criminal justice system will require a clear research strategy. We do not have one. We need clearly identified investment; we do not have it.

[Dr. Turner]

Moreover, we do not have any clearly recognised body that can validate a new technique before its application to the criminal justice service, or assess whether it is fit for evidential purposes in the courts. It is another role for the advisory council, and another on which I should like some guidance from my hon. Friend the Minister.

I shall not stray into the thorny issues of court procedures, the legal profession and so on. Those issues have been fairly well explored, but other related issues in addition to the fundamental question of the status of the Forensic Science Service have been exposed by the inquiry and need answers.

4.50 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): It has been a pleasure to serve on the Select Committee under the chairmanship both of the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who spoke so eloquently earlier, and of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), who introduced the debate so well. He demonstrated his acquisition of knowledge from an inquiry that took place in the main before he became Chairman, although we had an evidence session with Ministers under his chairmanship. That shows that he has quickly grasped the nuances of the scientific world, of the Committee and perhaps even of Committee members. He has also done that on all the other issues that we are dealing with.

This has been an enjoyable debate. I am sad that I was prevented from hearing 20 minutes of it by being detained outside the House. I apologise to you, Mr. Pope, and to other hon. Members for that. So much in the report could be raised, but I shall raise only two matters that were the subject of recommendations. First, paragraph 162, which talks about the prosecutor's fallacy and the presentation of DNA evidence, states:

"We are of the view that there is significant room for improvement in the way that statistical evidence, including risks and probabilities, is presented to juries. In order for this to occur, there needs to be a better understanding of the forms of wording and presentation that are easiest to understand, and least misleading, to members of the general public."

The Government response stated:

"The Home Office is considering the issues raised with regard to DNA evidence and have arranged a meeting with Mr Cooke"—

one of our witnesses—

"appropriate officials from the department, the Crown Prosecution Service and the Forensic Science Service to establish the issues which need to be addressed."

However, we recently heard from Mr. Cooke that no such meeting has taken place. I should be grateful if the Minister explained what the problem is, because the Government volunteered to have a meeting and my knowledge of Mr. Cooke is that he has strong views on the issues. The Committee had regard to them and he is unlikely to let the matter drop until the Government deal with it. We expect the Government to follow up the conclusion and I am sure that they wish to do so.

The second matter, on which I shall spend more time, is the scrutiny of expert evidence, with particular regard to the case of Professor Sir Roy Meadow. I should say at the outset that I do not know him. I do not believe that I have ever met him or spoken to him on the telephone. However, I feel strongly that there has been great unfairness in the way in which he has been treated and that that has huge implications for expert witnesses, as we mentioned in our report. I should, however, declare an interest in that my father is a retired professor of paediatrics, as is Professor Meadow, and I believe that he knows Sir Roy Meadow.

One thing that I do know about paediatricians, retired or otherwise, is that there is no private practice in paediatrics. There is a hard slog of long hours working for the health service, dealing in many cases either with critically ill children—some of the most distressing cases that one can deal with, in which life-and-death decisions are made in clinical practice—or with child protection, which involves highly controversial issues and in which, when there is a contested action, it is hard to conceive of feelings not being raised strongly on both sides. There is a duty on the prosecution in such cases to do what it can to protect children, and clearly it is of huge interest to the accused, innocent or otherwise, to defend themselves against heinous allegations.

I think that Professor Sir Roy Meadow was wronged in at least four ways. I am referring to the decision of the General Medical Council to bring a case against him, the decision of the GMC's fitness to practise panel to find against him on the charges brought, the subsequent decision to strike him off and, in particular, the press vilification to which he was subjected. I am not sure that we have dealt with that issue. I raise it because there can be miscarriages of justice. I hope that the GMC will learn from this case, given that Sir Roy Meadow was successful in his appeal against both the judgment and the sentence. The press vilification is particularly unfair to him because he is not in a position to respond when cases are sub judice or he knows of certain medical information or he is advised by his legal advisers that he cannot respond, whereas people who are accusing him can and do. The reporting was overblown and turned out to be wrong, given that he was cleared in the courts.

Sir Roy Meadow is still referred to as discredited despite having won his appeal, but I do not think that he is discredited. I hope that the Minister will agree with me that not only in Sir Roy Meadow's case but because we need expert medical witnesses to come forward to support the Courts Service, the press need to show responsibility when attacking someone before they are convicted by a disciplinary panel and, indeed, when they have been cleared by a court of that panel's finding.

Paragraph 170 of the report, which was written before Mr. Justice Collins's ruling in the High Court overruling the GMC decision, states:

"Expert witnesses have been penalised far more publicly than the judge or lawyers in cases where expert evidence has been called into question. These cases represent a systems failure. Focussing criticism on the expert has a detrimental effect on the willingness of other experts to serve as witnesses and detracts attention from the flaws in the court process and legal system which, if addressed, could help to prevent future miscarriages of justice."

That key recommendation should have given the Government pause for thought. However, their response was simply:

"The Committee's comments are noted."

Given the crucial role of expert witnesses and the importance of their being willing to come forward, the Government response is not satisfactory. They have must have a view on whether Professor Sir Alan Craft, president of the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, was correct when he said that the campaign against paediatricians in the field of child abuse

"has had an absolutely enormous effect on paediatricians. Paediatricians are frightened of getting involved in child protection work . . . I do not think you can actually underestimate what being reported to the GMC actually does to you—and paediatricians, I think, are pretty sensitive people, that is probably why they are paediatricians—and they do take it incredibly personally when the letter drops through the door saying that they have been reported to the GMC . . . so it is not surprising, given all this, that they are fearful of being involved in child protection."

That was quoted in the judgment of Mr. Justice Collins given on 17 February 2006 in the case between Meadow and the General Medical Council.

It is children who suffer if expert medical witnesses do not come forward. In saying that, I want to record my concern and my feelings for Sally Clark, who clearly suffered a miscarriage of justice. That was seen to be the case in the second appeal, at which the evidence from Dr. Williams, which was not adduced at an earlier stage, was found to be so critical that the judges did not even seek a retrial. There is no doubt, therefore, that her conviction was unsound, but that unsoundness was not based, as a succession of judicial authorities have found, on the evidence of Sir Roy Meadow or his conduct.

Dr. Iddon: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if a witness is in danger of being tripped up in open court, that is why a pre-trial hearing is extremely important?

Dr. Harris: I agree with that and with what the hon. Gentleman said about what needs to happen in this area, which reflected our report. I hope that there will be progress.

I would love to go into the issue of the evidence given, but it would not be appropriate. However, a couple of things need to be said. The evidence given by Sir Roy Meadow was not challenged by the defence in cross-examination and he was not recalled. The defence team had faxed to them the day before evidence from another expert, contradicting the statistics that he gave. Even if that had arrived too late for the defence, they could have recalled Professor Meadow to put it to him. The statistical error that Sir Roy Meadow made was obvious to people who work in that field, and I am surprised that so little has been said about the failures of the court system, including the defence.

Mr. Willis: And the judge.

Dr. Harris: I am cautious about criticising judges, but my hon. Friend mentions the judge. The judge in the Sally Clark trial made it clear to the jury that the case was not about statistics, particularly on sudden infant death syndrome, as the defence were not arguing that these were deaths from sudden infant death syndrome—that is, unknown natural causes. The judge escapes criticism in that respect, as he made that clear. Indeed, the Court of Appeal, when looking at the Meadow evidence in the first instance, upheld the conviction, even with regard to the fact that the evidence was found to be flawed.

What about the defence? We had an interesting exchange with the Attorney-General, Lord Goldsmith, in the evidence session on 23 November 2005. My hon. Friend, the Chairman of the Select Committee, asked at Question 67:

"How do we stop an expert witness like Meadow giving expert information on an area in which he was not an expert? Was that the judge's fault, or the prosecution's fault for asking him a question which was of a statistical nature rather than in fact within his remit?"— a well put question, if I may I say so. The Attorney-General replied:

"All of these cases teach us lessons, both on the prosecution side and on the defence side."

The defence was not mentioned in the question—he volunteered that. He went on:

"A particular statistical statement was made. I do not know whether the defence even challenged it or challenged his expertise to give that answer"—

I can tell the House that the defence did not do either of those things—

"which would really be the right way of dealing with it. I am certainly not blaming the defence."

I asked at Question 69:

"Lord Goldsmith has just said that he would not blame the defence in this case. I do not understand why . . . Everyone has blamed the expert who is said to have given it, and judged by the GMC to have given it"— that is, his evidence—

"in good faith; he was not malicious in so doing. So all the blame is on the good-faith guy, and then you are saying no blame attaches to the professionals who are paid to ensure that juries are not misled."

In response to that, Lord Goldsmith stated:

"If I may say so, I think that you make a very good and important point. I think it is unfair to put all the blame for these things which go wrong on a single expert, and I think that some of them have been vilified . . . All I was seeking to do was to avoid, frankly, the headline 'Attorney Blames Defence' in this particular case."

The Attorney-General may have his reasons for worrying about headlines rather than what is fair and right in law, but there is now a clear argument that there was a failure in this case. The question must be asked—I hope that the Minister will respond to it—whether judges with adequate training should step in and say, "That is a statistical point, it may or may not be right, you are not a statistician." That could have been done in this case. As it happens, I do not think that it was necessary. I would be interested to know whether the Minister thinks that more could be done in this area.

The other point is that Mr. Justice Collins in the High Court found for Roy Meadow on three bases: first, that he should not have been struck off, and secondly, that he should not have been found to be guilty of serious professional misconduct. He said that in strong terms, and the GMC have not appealed those two aspects of the judgment, which suggests that it accepts them. The GMC needs to reflect carefully on his criticisms of their judgment and processes.

Mr. Justice Collins's third point was that expert witnesses should have immunity from disciplinary proceedings. That is a substantial part of case law now, and may well be challenged. The GMC has signalled that it will challenge it. It would be useful for Ministers to say what they think is right, as expert witnesses want to know—there should not be this limbo—whether they run the risk of facing disciplinary action by the GMC or other professional bodies and having the vilification that even Ministers such as the Attorney-General have accepted took place in this case.

[Dr. Harris]

Mr. Justice Collins makes a reasonable suggestion in his judgment, which is that the principle that there should be immunity from civil prosecution for expert witnesses should apply for disciplinary proceedings, except when the judge makes the referral. If there is serious criticism by a judge, the judge will make the referral themselves, yet the GMC states in its response to the judgment, and later in seeking to appeal this aspect of the judgment, that where there has been criticism by a court, the GMC's procedures should be allowed for disciplinary cases. However, there was not serious criticism of Sir Roy Meadow by a judge in this case. Mr. Justice Collins said that if there is serious criticism, a judge can make a referral. That would be sensible, and I hope that the Minister will give his view on it.

I hope that the judgment in the High Court and the clearing of Sir Roy Meadow will make it possible for paediatricians to come forward and do work that protects children. There have been miscarriages of justice in this area—I am in no doubt about that—but we face equal or greater miscarriages of justice if we do not correct the impression out there that expert witnesses are themselves on trial. When they act in good faith, they should not be on trial or facing that threat; otherwise, children will suffer.

5.6 pm

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) and the former Chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), on an excellent report. I was less pleased with the Government's response, in that it was fairly short and did not answer some of the issues that were raised. I shall be relatively brief.

As a former chairman of the London Assembly Transport Committee, the words "public-private partnership" strike fear in my heart because of the amount of money that may be paid to lawyers, how things may be negotiated and how things may go wrong in such circumstances. I understand that our Forensic Science Service is exemplary, one of the best in the world. My fear of a move to privatisation is that the service will be dilapidated in some way.

My experience of the private sector is that, when an in-house department that serves a primary function—the Forensic Science Service first and foremost serves our criminal investigation units and our police—makes itself available on a commercial basis outside, it moves across functions and other demands are made on it. It then has the dilemma as to whether to meet the commercial demand and receive revenue from outside, or whether to facilitate its original purpose, which in this case is to serve the police force.

It is not simply price competition that is the issue. It is also a matter of the capacity of the company, GovCo or PPP to provide the service. What does it prioritise—the huge commercial contract from abroad, which will bring in lots of money, or the needs of the police force? Which will be given priority by the privatised company? There are inherent dangers in moving towards PPP, so I urge caution in respect of the time scale by which the Government wish to proceed. The criteria, which I do not have time to deal with today, must be robust. I cannot imagine any circumstances in which I would wish the Forensic Science Service to move to a PPP.

It is important to know at this point what sort of inquiries have been made about companies that might have a commercial use for the databases that will be created. For example, divorce lawyers could have an interest in DNA databases, as they could use them for their purposes. A great deal of interest will be expressed in the DNA databases, and we should be more concerned about that.

As we have heard from many hon. Members, the DNA database and DNA collection are of great concern. The expansion of what I regard as a national database by stealth is a huge issue, and if that is the Government's purpose, they should have a proper debate on the Floor of the House. We have had no reassurance on any measure as far as security of access is concerned, or on the security of the databases and protection against misuse, whether that is hacking or more commercial activity.

I recently attended a European Standing Committee where a European Union proposal based on the principle of availability was discussed. Our databases will be made available to competent law enforcement agencies in all 25 EU member states for the purpose of catching criminals. What is on our database will be available in 25 countries, and the Secretary of State had no answers about that on the day.

Mr. Newmark: Does the hon. Lady share my concern about the broader issue of civil liberties? Of course, we must tackle crime and we should have the DNA of those who cause problems but, as she says, collecting DNA by stealth is an infringement of our civil liberties. That is the broader issue that we should be most concerned with.

Lynne Featherstone: The hon. Gentleman is right, but there are so many issues relating to the collection of DNA and the DNA database that I almost do not know where to begin.

Disproportionality is another concern in relation to the databases. We heard some of the figures on the non-cautioned and non-charged side of the equation. Twenty-four per cent. of those on the database are black and from ethnic minorities, who comprise only 8 per cent. of the general population. I agree that the juvenile figure is terrible. There is a distinction, but not a huge one; if someone is innocent, they are innocent whatever age they are. I have not heard a logical argument from the Government as to why we should retain the DNA of anyone who is completely innocent. We hear the mantra, "What is the problem if they are innocent?" But our civil liberties rest on a presumption of innocence until one is proven guilty, not a presumption of, "I'll keep it in case it is useful one day."

Regarding the question of innocence, on 30 March, the Minister said:

"Forecasts indicate that it is likely to expand to 4.25 million profiles by 2007–08".

He added:

"It is not the case that anyone added to it is 'innocent'."

In the same speech, he stated that there will be

"some instances where entirely innocent young people are arrested and sampled in a case of mistaken identity".—[Official Report, 30 March 2006; Vol. 444, cc. 1128–1130.]

There is confusion in the Minister's statement that serves only to exemplify and heighten the problems to which I have just alluded. I would like some clarification from him.

Control and custodianship of the database must be raised. It is a positive step that the Government are to revise the custodial arrangements for the DNA database and to move away from control by the FSS to avoid a conflict of interest, but I would welcome detail of any discussions the Government have had with the Association of Police Authorities or the Association of Chief Police Officers regarding independent oversight of the database. Have such discussions taken place?

I would also like to know the nature of the information that is to be stored on the database. The Government claim that such a database is needed to combat crime, but the information contained in it, though under independent custodianship, still needs to be public property and not a private commodity.

I wanted to expand a little on some of the unintended consequences of disproportionality in the collection of data, particularly with regard to those who are innocent. Even if someone is found guilty of a crime and has their details put on the DNA database, what happens when they have served their sentence? Someone has to have been arrested for their DNA to be taken, and if they are then let go without caution or charge, so be it. It is possible that, at some point, the process could lead to refusals. If someone who had been arrested were, for example, to apply for a job in a bank or as a pilot, there might be stigma attached—especially as the details spread throughout the EU—simply because they were on a database, and the distinction between being innocent and guilty might not be made. There are inherent dangers and the future of an innocent person might well be blighted at some point because many people believe that there is no smoke without fire.

The exacerbation of the problem of this database by stealth, particularly with regard to disproportionality, pertains to police discretionary powers. That is a debate for another day, but the result of the process in itself is disproportionality. That is exacerbated greatly by the DNA profiling that can now be carried out through the advance of science, which allows us to tell from DNA the ethnic mix of blood and, therefore, where a person might come from. There was a case in south London where 1,000 people of interest were asked to volunteer a DNA sample, all of whom were black because in this case the test would not hold water for the European white population. After such sweeps, the DNA is destroyed, but those who gave a sample were asked to sign a voluntary agreement that their DNA could be retained. Such processes contribute to the further disproportionality of our DNA databases.

Along with the details of the innocent, the Minister is storing up problems for the future. I want him to answer those questions. It is not appropriate to continue along our current path without having a debate on the matter in the House of Commons in the proper way. There are too many dangers and risks involved. People's civil liberties are at stake.

5.17 pm

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): It has been a far-ranging debate. I congratulate the Committee on its report, "Forensic Science on Trial". However, it is not just forensic science on trial, but science. We have heard about higher education in the UK and the future of the Forensic Science Service, which is of some concern to many hon. Members. The FSS has given good service to justice in the UK, and it is not in anyone's interest—certainly not that of Government—for it to be damaged in any way, particularly if that were on the altar of it becoming a GovCo, and possibly a PPP initiative.

We have also heard about training for the FSS and forensic medicine in general. The hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner)—some might say he is my MP, because that is my original stamping ground—spoke about the chemistry department of Sussex university. I undertook my master of science degree at Sussex, although not in chemistry. It is not just Sussex university that is suffering from a degradation in science studies, but others.

We have heard about the type of degrees that one might do in forensic science. There are 50 courses and 350 combinations of courses. Some examples were given, such as forensic science and music, religious culture and forensics. The phrase "Mickey Mouse" courses was used, but perhaps that is a little unfair. The aspirations of students are very important. Do they seriously expect to go straight into forensics with a degree in forensic medicine and media studies, which the Minister gave as an example from a sedentary position? The clear answer has to be no. As the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown said, clearer guidance should be given to students regarding what their expectations of going into forensic science might be, given their particular course.

Another tremendously important area discussed was the assessment and interpretation of evidence in courts, not only by the lawyers who present the evidence but by the jurors. One contributor spoke about a study being undertaken by the Home Office on how juries make their decisions. It is a dangerous path to tread. However, it is important. The example was given that one juror might have scientific knowledge—or claim to—and persuade the other 11 to give a guilty or not guilty verdict.

The real problem in this country—I have argued this for a long time and it does not happen so much in the United States—is that we tend to get either artists or scientists, and ne'er the twain shall meet. Whether it is because of our A-level system, which forces us to study three or four subjects from the age of 16 onwards, I do not know. However, it is a fact that we often end up with inarticulate scientists and innumerate artists. Incidentally, I did a law degree but with double maths, physics and English A-levels, which was most unusual. I think that I was the only person doing a law degree with any sort of science A-level background. I thought that it would help me to be a better lawyer; clearly, it has affected my ability to be articulate, but that is why I became an MP instead.

It is important that lawyers are given training in some aspects of forensic science. They are certainly given professional training in the rules of evidence, and a subset of evidence is forensics. However, there is no training in that at present, as far as I know. I hope that hon. Members who did their professional exams more recently than I did can correct me if I am wrong, but I am convinced that there is no training in that at all.

That is why we get the problems that the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) talked about, where people who give professional evidence in court in good faith as so-called experts—often they are experts—are vilified by untrained journalists and, I am afraid, politicians. There has been a lot of talk about the DNA database, which is maintained by police forces in the United Kingdom. I speak not for my party, but personally when I say that I have no objection. If Parliament wanted a DNA database for the entire population, and that was Parliament's will, I could see some advantages. It would not only help in the detection of crime, but have huge importance in epidemiology—

Dr. Evan Harris: Paternity.

Michael Fabricant: Yes, and paternity. It would help in epidemiology and the understanding of the spread of disease, genetically and in general. However, as so many hon. Members have said, that has to be a decision for Parliament. It should not be a decision for individual chief constables or, in some instances, those who rank below chief constable. That is plainly wrong. We are ending up with a sort of Untermenschen: those who are found to be innocent or voluntarily gave their DNA and are kept on a database, while others are not. That is clearly unprofessional and wrong and Parliament needs to take a view.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) raised some interesting points about the forensic service in his police force. He said that this need not be about just the national Forensic Science Service, but that police forces too can have a forensic service. He spoke eloquently and proudly about the service that is maintained in Northamptonshire. It would seem that Northamptonshire police are a beacon with that service. It would be a dreadful shame if that service and detection rate were lost because of the mergers proposed by the Home Office. My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) also spoke at some length about the need for training for lawyers, which I mentioned earlier. There need to be professional exams on rules of evidence. A series of issues have been raised.

I want to move briefly on to the Government's response to this excellent report. I do not want to sound pompous, or rather grand, like a great parliamentarian—I use that phrase and pronunciation very carefully—but I have served on the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, on the National Heritage Committee, as it was called previously, under the great chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman), and briefly on the Home Affairs Committee under Robin Corbett, who is now in the other place, and I have to say that the Government's response to this report takes the biscuit. The hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown said that they use weasel words; he was being positively generous.

I have an example—it is quite extraordinary. The response contains marvellous examples of political correctness and political speak. Paragraph 4 cites paragraph 42 of the report, which states:

> "The Home Office's evidence clearly implies that, contrary to the impression given in its earlier statement, progression to PPP could indeed occur in the absence of agreement by all stakeholders that this is the best way to proceed. It is hard not to interpret the statement as an attempt to mollify those who opposed the PPP by using deliberate obfuscation."

What is the Government's response?

> "The Government has engaged in full and ongoing consultation with stakeholders".

Come on. "Ongoing"? Do we use that word nowadays? Clearly the Home Office does, and it went on at some short length to try to justify the Government's standing on that subject.

We hear in the report about the Government's track record at managing PPP projects. It states:

> "High-profile problems have arisen, for instance, in the PPP projects for the national air traffic control system and the new IT systems for the Child Support Agency and the Magistrates' Courts".

We cannot just blame the poor old Home Office and Home Office Ministers. The national health service computer system is an absolute disgrace and a disaster. It is costing the country and taxpayers a fortune and Computer Weekly recently said that the data contained on it are open to hacking. One has to wonder whether the DNA database is also open to hacking, as was mentioned earlier.

Professor Jeffreys said in his evidence that there could be significant cost implications associated with the collection of 16 markers for each profile. That was in connection with whether there should be 10 or 16 markers for DNA evidence, which comes back to identifying the probabilities and certainties of whether DNA evidence is always accurate. We have heard examples of how fingerprinting may not be accurate. There used to be an assumption some years ago that, if a fingerprint matched up, that person had to be guilty. We heard a good example today of how that might not be the case. Similarly, although DNA is a powerful tool in detecting miscreants, we must not always assume that a DNA match means 100 per cent. that the person is guilty. Clearly, that is not the case.

I do not want to detain hon. Members. We have heard some excellent speeches by hon. Members from all parties. Some serious questions have been asked of the Minister by Government Members as well as Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members. I do not want to shorten the time available to the Minister so that he cannot respond fully. It has been a full and helpful debate, and I hope that he will do the Chamber the courtesy of answering those questions in detail.

5.29 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): It is a pleasure to see you in your elevated position, Mr. Pope. I congratulate you on that promotion and on another promotion giving you cause to smile—that of Accrington Stanley to the football league. It is a good time for you, Mr. Pope, with two promotions following hard on one another.

I, too, thank the Select Committee for what has been an excellent debate. As the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) said, there have been some truly excellent and distinguished contributions, by hon. Members who have a great deal of expertise in the field. The range of contributions shows the level at which the Committee has engaged with the issues. I welcome that indeed.

The distinguished Chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), referred to English graduates at one point, so I hope that he will not hold it against me when I say that this humble English graduate is being tested to the full today. My solitary O-level in biology is being stretched to its limits by the Committee, but I shall do my best.

The Committee is not celebrating its achievements enough. The publication of the report, under the then chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), since followed up assiduously by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough, has led to an unprecedented focus on forensic science, certainly in this place. Mention has been made of the Adjournment debate on 18 October last year and the oral evidence, when three Ministers came before the Committee. The hon. Gentleman may not like the fact that we do not meet more often, but that was an unprecedented development and a welcome one. There was the debate on the revocation of the trading fund order that allowed us to establish the GovCo, which was also used for a wide-ranging debate on the Forensic Science Service. There was also a recent debate on the national DNA database, as the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone) said. I do not believe that there has ever been so much scrutiny or focus in Parliament on such matters. That focus is to be welcomed, and the Committee's report has played a vital role in stimulating the process.

I carefully read an article that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough wrote in The Times this week about the report and the follow-up to it. If I read the article correctly, the tone was one of disappointment and chiding, saying that more should be done. That is why I say that the Committee should celebrate its successes more. The hon. Gentleman finished by saying:

"The case for complacency needs to be proven."

However, complacency does not at all characterise the Government's attitude. Through the DNA expansion programme, the Home Office has been investing unprecedented resources into expanding the use of DNA and, more generally, the quality of science available to our police forces.

To refer to the point that the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) made, those resources have gone directly into the capacity of police forces. There have been enormous levels of activity, which will ultimately knock on to the courts because, as was said, more evidence will come before the courts involving forensic studies and DNA.

Although the Committee might not achieve every recommendation in its report, I hope that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough will accept that there is progress on its substantial points. I shall go through the main issues that the hon. Gentleman itemised and draw out some of the observations that other hon. Members made. The hon. Gentleman's main issue was the changed status of the Forensic Science Service. I am well aware of his concern and that of the Committee but, to be clear, there is anything but confusion. I am extremely clear about the process that we have under way and I should like to reassure him and the Committee about that.

Two significant developments have taken place since I gave evidence before the Committee. The first was the revocation of the trading fund status and the creation of the GovCo in December 2005. That was a major development, but in the end it happened smoothly and without great uncertainty. I am pleased to say that the FSS has settled down well and has taken to GovCo status quickly.

Secondly, I gave the hon. Gentleman my commitment during the Committee sitting that I attended to publish the criteria on which we would judge any further change in status to a PPP. For the avoidance of any doubt whatever—I say this directly to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon)—I can say that no irrevocable decision has been taken. Indeed, to pick up the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) made too, when I introduced the revocation of the trading fund order in December, I was persuaded that more time needed to be given. I was influenced by the Committee that day. I am sure that my hon. Friend pushed me more than once on the GovCo needing to be given time to bed down, get used to the new status and the new freedoms available to it, and have a chance to succeed in its own right. That is the phrase that we have used and it is a phrase that I will repeat and stick by. I extended the minimum time in which we said that no decision would be taken. We had said that no decision would be taken before December 2006, but in the course of that debate we said that no decision would be taken before the summer of 2007. We did not go for the full two years that my hon. Friend asked me for today, but I hope that he does not feel that we are not listening. We are, and I responded directly to some of the points that he made.

The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) mentioned limbo. It also would not be right to have a prolonged sense of limbo. We need clarity and an open process and, when the time comes to make a decision, to be clear about it and allow the FSS to have certainty about its future, because a prolonged period of uncertainty is not in the interests of the service.

We published the criteria on 29 March. They set out the four key areas by which we will judge the GovCo in due course. To conclude on this point, however, I repeat that no decision has been taken. I have been keen to give the FSS time to adapt to its new GovCo status, and to see what benefits it brings and how the service can use them to improve its operation.

To recognise the point made well by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East, I note that changes are taking place in the forensic science market. There was recently a major merger of the two other players, which will have an impact on the marketplace as a whole. He mentioned that I had identified the needs of the criminal justice system as the paramount concern in judging the criteria. That has to be at the forefront of any discussion.

[Andy Burnham]

The second itemised criterion is the state of the UK forensic services marketplace. Of course the issue will be informed by the matters that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough raised, and we shall want to consider them extremely carefully. At the end of the day, our first consideration should be the quality of the service provided to the police and the criminal justice system. That is what we are about. I am sure that we could all unite behind trying to achieve the highest quality of provision. That should be the key point that determines our discussions.

We have laid out a clear way for the FSS in the statement. I hope to assure hon. Members that I will certainly continue to deal with the process openly and with straightforward responses to questions. Where we can give information on performance, we will of course seek to do so. To pick up the concerns that my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown raised, the process should not be secretive, but nor can we compromise the FSS as it seeks to enhance its position in the marketplace. We need to make that balanced judgment, but I can give the Committee many of the assurances that it wants on such matters.

To pick up on the point that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough made, I do not think that it is wrong for the Home Office to take the balanced, rounded view. We have the broadest possible view, in considering the interests of the police, the criminal justice system and public safety in the round. We are well placed to make that decision. As I tried to outline, we need to balance all the factors and criteria.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough mentioned FSS staff pensions. It is true that the staff are now public servants rather than civil servants. As such, they are no longer entitled to accrued benefits within the principal civil service pension scheme. However, the terms and conditions are broadly comparable. I will be visiting the FSS at Chorley tomorrow morning, and I am sure that the trade union representatives and I will be engaged on those matters. I meet them regularly, and I know that they are constantly updated.

Several hon. Members spoke about the national DNA database, which is of considerable interest at the moment. I make it plain that Parliament has taken a view on the national database. The extension of police powers to collect information was debated in Parliament, and a positive vote was given on those precise matters. Colleagues will remember that the question originated in a ruling by the House of Lords, when DNA evidence that was deemed inadmissible because there was no legal basis on which it could be retained, could not be introduced in a rape trial, even though it would have provided conclusive proof in that case. It is not true that Parliament has not been consulted.

Michael Fabricant: Will the Minister give way?

Lynne Featherstone: Will the Minister give way?

Andy Burnham: I shall use the time remaining to me; I have only a few moments, and I want to address more of the points raised this afternoon.

The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green said that if the Government were building a database by stealth, they should say so. We are not. We have no intention of building a national DNA database covering everyone in the country, even though others might favour such a proposal. Only a small number of people—about 30 highly security cleared individuals—have direct access to the national DNA database. The hon. Lady said that an assurance had not been given on the subject; I have given that assurance before, but I repeat it. It involves only a small number of highly cleared people. It is not true that the DNA database can be accessed from police stations. There are strict controls on who is able to gain direct access to that information.

The hon. Lady asked about the sharing of information and the principle of its availability in Europe. It may be in our interests to co-operate. The DNA database holds details of unsolved crimes as well as those of individuals. I hope that by sharing some of our information on unsolved crimes with European colleagues, we can solve crimes that have remained unsolved for many years. I want to see more, not less co-operation.

A further safeguard that the Committee can be assured of is that the statutory purposes of the national DNA database are clearly laid down in statute. Those purposes do not include use in the divorce courts or in the other places about which there was speculation. The statutory purposes are clearly linked to the prevention and detection of crime. That is the clear focus of the database. Those provisions were amended by Parliament to include the identification of dead bodies, following the awful tsunami in south-east Asia. That change, too, had the support of the whole House. The statutory purposes of the database are clearly limited in law, and people will welcome that.

Many other issues were raised today, and in the normal run of events I would give hon. Members a full answer. I shall seek to write to hon. Members who raised specific points.

I was pleased to hear about the developments in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East with Zentek Forensics; I hope that my constituents, too, might benefit from that.

I heard what the hon. Member for Kettering said about police force expansion, but I was completely unconvinced by the logic of his argument. In fact, I think that a strong argument can be made that larger police forces would use science far more effectively and invest in it far more strategically.

I cannot do justice in the time available to the legal issues raised by the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris). I assure him that commitments given by the Attorney-General to the Committee in November have been—

It being fifteen minutes to Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 25 April 2006

[MR. CHRISTOPHER CHOPE in the Chair]

First Great Western Franchise

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

9.30 am

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): First, I wish to thank you, Mr. Chope, for ensuring that this debate takes place, if you did so; if you did not, I must thank Mr. Speaker. The debate could not be more timely, or better attended, as Back Benchers of all parties are present and will wish to catch your eye. That is most unusual in a 9.30 am debate in Westminster Hall.

I have been a train enthusiast all my life. I have two historic steam train lines in my constituency, with which I am actively involved—if not on the footplate, I certainly give them all the enthusiasm I can. Trains have a long and prestigious history in my constituency.

Every train journey offers a sense of adventure. Everyone feels that rail travel has a romantic mystique; rail journeys provide a sense of wonder to us, as we whistle past the countryside. Train transport has been one of the great and most glamorous means of getting around the world. An illustrious former resident of my constituency, the late Agatha Christie, set many of her adventures and murder stories on trains. I have been an MP for south Devon constituencies since 1983. The total train miles that I have travelled during that period would have taken me around the world several times—if not to the moon and back.

Transport is allegedly one of the three priority policy areas of the current Government. However, in spite of an enormous growth in passenger rail travel, there has been absolutely no improvement in the western region rail network as a whole. The south-west is one of the most neglected regions in the country in respect of public transport. Although Britain is the fifth largest economy in the world, the west country still has a 1960s rail infrastructure, making it difficult to run fast, frequent and reliable services there.

The importance of fast, frequent and reliable services for the economy and for tourism cannot be overstated. We need to have a three-hour Paddington to Plymouth service. The December 2004 timetable demonstrated that Plymouth was, at last, again located three hours from London, as it had been in the '70s and '80s, with two daily services up and three down achieving the three-hour timing. The Transport Committee repeatedly recognised a three-hour threshold—not three hours and a bit, but three hours—as the maximum time that most inward investor location search engines regard as their cut-off period. The Plymouth three-hour journey time has also acted as the benchmark requirement for Network Rail to deliver sustained maintenance standards and new investment in order to allow the necessary line running speeds.

The Government have announced the commissioning of a new fleet of 125 mph high-speed trains, but they will not come into service until 2015—in nine years' time. That is simply to replace the current 125 mph trains that were introduced in the 1970s. Therefore, in nine years' time we will get trains that go no faster than those running in the 1970s. Worse, the new and existing 125 mph trains are operationally restricted by the maximum speed that is permitted along the entire 300-mile length of the Reading to Penzance main line, which is merely 110 mph, and in many places very much less than that. If the speed limit were 125 mph, Paddington to Exeter would be attainable in less than one hour and 50 minutes, Plymouth could be reached in less than two hours and 40 minutes, and the time to Penzance would be four hours and 30 minutes. The Government must upgrade the Great Western main line so that high-speed trains can travel at the speed they were built to travel at in the 1970s, and will again be built to travel at in 2015.

The high cost of travel acts as a deterrent to business and tourists. The first class return train fare from London to Totnes is now more expensive than a British Airways economy return fare to San Francisco. People can fly to the European Union capitals in less time than it takes to go from Totnes to London at the weekends.

The impact of a reduced rail service on CO_2 emissions and road congestion might be of interest to the House—it is also an extremely topical issue. One would have thought that the Government would have done everything possible to ensure that train travel was more attractive in terms of both speed and cost than car travel, but they have not. If they were environmentally conscious in any way, they would have understood the impact of CO_2 emissions from road congestion, which will get worse if services to and around the west country continue to be reduced. The Government policy should be to get people off the roads, but we learn from last Sunday's newspapers that, on the contrary, thousands of miles of new roads are planned, but no new railways.

A new track should be laid between Exeter and Plymouth along the line of the A38. That would cut half an hour from the journey time to and from the capital. If the speed limits were increased from 110 mph to 125 mph from Reading to Exeter, the journey to and from Exeter would be about one and a half hours. If we were in China or the Chinese were here, that new track would have been built within a year, but the Government have not even given it the consideration it deserves. Instead, the track follows the Brunel line of the 19th century, hugging the coastline, which is threatened by global warming.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the leader of my party, said yesterday, we must give people, and particularly those living in our towns and cities, serious travel options that do not involve the car. As the TUC said in "Making South West Work Better", its 2005 regional economic strategy paper:

> "Carbon emissions from transport in the UK are rising rapidly. Transport is currently responsible for 26 per cent. of the UK's carbon emissions. The growth of road and air transport has resulted in a significant increase in greenhouse gas emissions over the past decade."

Although the Department for Transport recognises that, and is responsible for helping to deliver reductions in CO_2 emissions, it has totally failed to do so.

Last year, cars emitted 19.39 million tonnes of carbon equivalent into the atmosphere, and 11.68 million tonnes of carbon equivalent came from other commercial vehicles. Domestic and international aviation accounted for 8.67 million tonnes, buses for under 1 million tonnes—970,000, to be exact—and diesel rail for only 260,000 tonnes. That gives some idea of the scale of the problem from motor vehicles: to repeat, 19.39 million tonnes of carbon equivalent that goes into the atmosphere comes from cars, and 260,000 tonnes comes from diesel rail.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate. I must also declare what I might call an informal interest: the line to which he refers runs 10 yd away from my house, and the high-speed trains shake it gently as they pass, so the idea of faster trains causes me a little alarm in respect of its structure.

However, my hon. Friend is making a point about the effect on the environment. He is also discussing long-distance trains, but, like me, he represents a rural area, and I ask him to reflect on the effect on local rural services. In the town of Melksham in my constituency, where usage has gone up by a factor of nine over the past few years, the services will be cut from one every two hours to two round trips a day. The effect on traffic in my area will be enormous. At a time when we are talking about the importance of the environment, it seems very strange that the Government are acceding to a reduction in services in places such as Melksham, which will be bad for people's transport, for the mobility of elderly people and for jobs.

Mr. Steen: My right hon. and learned Friend must have seen the later parts of my speech, although of course I do not accuse him of cribbing from it. There has been a 40 per cent. increase in commuter traffic in rural areas, but a reduction in the rail service; it is absolutely mad. I shall come on to that. I am most grateful for his intervention, and I am sorry about his house; perhaps he should move.

I have some figures that hon. Members will be interested to hear on carbon dioxide emissions, in kilograms per passenger per journey, for the journey between London and Bristol. By modern diesel rail, the amount is 10.6 kg, and by car it is almost double: 21.3 kg. Recent Government figures show that, on the journey between London and Edinburgh, the average passenger travelling by electric train is responsible for about 12 kg of CO_2 emissions; by car, the journey burns up 70 kg of CO_2 per passenger. By air, the figure is nearly 100 kg. If we really have concerns about the environment, we should be encouraging the maximum number of people on to the railways, not the roads.

Paradoxically, although road transport emits six times more CO_2 per passenger mile than rail, motoring costs have fallen, and although rail is far more carbon-efficient, rail fares continue to increase sharply. A moment ago, I illustrated that with the fact that it is cheaper to fly economy with British Airways from Heathrow to San Francisco, return, than to get a London-Plymouth first class rail return. That gives some idea of the level of fares.

Rural Devon roads cannot handle any more traffic. The same point was made about Wiltshire by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). My Urban Regeneration and Countryside Protection Bill, which I introduced six years ago, was talked out by the Government, but it would have played a part in not allowing more building or development if the infrastructure was not in place, and that would include roads and rail. The economic growth of the south-west depends on modern and efficient transport corridors, pre-eminent among which must be a top-class rail network.

I want to deal with the minimum specifications in the Government franchise document. It is important that we get the subject out of the way, so that the Minister has an opportunity to answer on this point. In preparing the franchise document, the Department for Transport came up with the minimum service level commitment timetable. I do not know how it was worked out, but the civil servants who produced it clearly did not know the region, or understand the work patterns of the people living in it. It was hopeless, inappropriate, inadequate and against the interests of those living in the west country.

The December 2004 timetable should have been the baseline for the Department for Transport's timetable. Why? Because it was developed over a three-year, post-Hatfield period in open collaboration between the train operators, Network Rail, the local authorities, passenger groups, and business and tourism groups. For that reason, it was welcomed and accepted by all such groups. Yet the timetable that emerged from the Department for Transport took no account of the 2004 timetable, and completely ignored the objective 2 status of Plymouth and its need to be within three hours of London. The Department for Transport timetable has done the Government considerable harm and has caused immense friction and anger throughout the region. It is as inexcusable as it is inexplicable.

One thing that the Government did get right was their decision to continue the franchise with the FirstGroup. The company understands the area and responded quickly and correctly to the avalanche of representations made by the county and district councils, commercial and voluntary organisations, the TUC and others. I thank the company for its measured and sensible approach, in dramatic contrast to that of the Government. The Government were content to allow trains to and from Totnes to be reduced by 50 per cent. I was deluged with letters from angry and concerned constituents, and that anger spilled over into a protest on the platform itself.

I must pause to deal with two questions that I tabled and their answers, because they show the Government's view on the subject. I asked the Secretary of State and the Minister who will reply today said:

"why his Department's tender document for the West of England franchise specifies a reduction in the number of trains calling at Totnes",

"The Great Western Franchise specification was designed to improve the overall operational and financial performance of the train service and to ensure resources were used to best meet market needs. The timetable on each route, including Totnes is derived from these requirements.

Most passengers in the Great Western Franchise area will see the same or improved service", but not those in Totnes. He continued:

"First's consultation on their draft timetable has now closed and First are in discussion with the Department".—[Official Report, House of Commons, 27 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 630W.]

In a second question, I asked the Secretary of State

"what criteria the Department used in deciding to specify in the Greater Western Franchise that the first train from London to Totnes should not arrive before midday on weekday services."

That is what was going to happen. One would not be able to get to Totnes, which serves the whole south Devon area, before midday. The answer was:

"The specification for the Greater Western franchise was set to achieve value for money for the taxpayer and the travelling public and provide the best service for the greatest number of passengers across the franchise."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 19 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 711–12W.]

That is just not true. The Government were proposing not the best service, but the worst possible service. So much so that at the first round of discussions, First Great Western ensured that the first train will stop at Totnes way before midday. In my view, all that the Government were concerned about was getting their £1.2 million a week, with no regard for the consequences for the travelling public. If they did not like it, they could go by road—that was the Government's attitude.

I pay tribute to First Great Western's management team for understanding the west country people and for listening to the rightful concerns of public authorities, businesses, private companies and, above all, local people. As a result of the appalling muddle and the Government's mismanagement, there can be only a few people in the west country who feel that the service is better run by the Government.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): The hon. Gentleman puts a lot of the blame on the Government, and I understand why, but I wonder whether he can help me. I am in a difficult situation because I have letters from the Minister in which he assured me that at Freshford and Oldfield Park stations, there would be an hourly train at off-peak times and two trains an hour at peak times. He says in the letter that the plans "represent my Department's intentions for these stations. This is being made clear to the bidders for the franchise".

So the Government had a clear intention. For me, the problem is the other way round: under the timetable, there will not be those hourly services; there will be a two-hour gap. There will not even be two trains an hour at peak time—[Interruption.]

Mr. Steen: My hon. Friends are helpfully answering the hon. Gentleman. In spite of their comments, he is really making the same point as I am about the reduction in services. Whether it is the Government's fault or the operator's, and whether or not there are too many trains on the line, we are making the same point. We want more and faster trains, and we want more people off the road. I could not agree with him more. I do not know about his particular problem because I am not a train operator, but the issue is absolutely clear.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I was a little taken aback when the hon. Gentleman said that the Government should get all the blame and First should get all the credit. I do not know whether he has looked in detail at the subsidy arrangement involved in this franchise. First probably was the best bidder, but let us consider what it gets out of the arrangement. It admittedly takes some risk, but it also gets the profits, some of which may be shared with the DFT. If the predictions of increased passengers and rail fares are not right, there will be a disproportionate burden on the Government to pick up the impact of the potential losses, so the arrangement is not quite as good as is being suggested. I would argue that the state has not got such a wonderful deal out of the arrangement. What are the hon. Gentleman's comments on that?

Mr. Steen: I am not going to make any comments on that at the moment, but the point will be noted by the Minister and by my colleagues.

I come now to the number of trains from Totnes to Exeter and from Totnes to Plymouth during rush hour. The roads around Totnes and the A38 are jammed as people travel to and from work by car. If regular trains travelled in both directions at the right price, a great number of people would go by train rather than use fuel and park their cars in the town centres. Why do people not travel by train? Simply because the number of trains is being reduced, fares are too high and coaches are being crammed to the gunnels.

Some trains that stop at Totnes have only one coach; others have only two. So full are they that schoolchildren are virtually swinging from the chandeliers. People understandably prefer their own cars. [Interruption.] I should say to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) that I do not think trains have chandeliers in his part of the world.

Rural rail services have been cut, despite their growing popularity. Passenger numbers on ill-fated branch lines have increased by up to 40 per cent. in recent years, and the branch lines across the west country will lose up to half their daily trains. That list is borne out by the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning) about the Barnstaple to Exeter line. She wished to talk about that today, but has not been able to come—mind you, she probably would not have got in. The Barnstaple to Exeter line is greatly used by commuters.

The reduction in rural services has nothing to do with CO_2 emissions or passenger convenience: it is simply about reducing the rail network's £5 billion annual subsidy. The cuts in rural services are as great as when Beeching axed the line in the '60s, and literally thousands of west country people use the roads and increase CO_2 emissions because of them. It should be quicker and cheaper for such people to travel by train, but it is not. It is sheer madness to cut rural local services that are used by increasing numbers of local commuters when we should be encouraging such services to the maximum.

I give the Government credit for one thing. I am delighted that we have managed to save the sleeper to Penzance. When I was Member of Parliament for Liverpool, Wavertree, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and I played a part in saving the sleeper service to London, which was going to be axed. I am only sorry that when I moved to south Devon in 1983, that commitment was not continued, and the sleeper service no longer exists. I pay tribute to Lord Freeman, then Transport Minister and responsible for the first franchise document for the west country. He took little persuading that the night sleeper to Penzance should continue.

The only snag now is that as a result of rearrangements suggested by the Government, we have got rid of the Plymouth coach. One finds oneself at

[Mr. Steen]

5.50 am, having come down from London, standing on the platform with nowhere to go and nothing to do. In the winter it is very cold.

The unreliability of the timetable is such that some say that there is no point in there being one at all, and that we should just go to the station and see what turns up and where it is going. Such jaundiced remarks come from regular commuters who despair of ever having a week free from catastrophe or delay; on the line there may be leaves, or cows or other animals that seem to have a fascination with train lines and have become the keenest train spotters of them all. It is convenient to blame First Great Western for unreliable service, but it is as well to remember that at least 50 per cent. of all delays are caused by track or signalling failures or a combination of both.

Finally, I come to the question of the track. The situation of the infrastructure is a major cause of ongoing delays and is blamed on the fact that 78 per cent. of the rails were laid before 1970. The approach of Network Rail does not give priority to the needs of the travelling public. For example, after track repairs, temporary speed restrictions are unnecessarily low. Similar priority is given to two or three trains from the Mendips carrying stone each night, which prevents weekday night work on the entire Reading to Taunton track. Network Rail needs to be more flexible and more consumer oriented and to ensure that the speeds allowed after repair are much greater.

For example, when the track was nationalised under British Rail, there was a 100 mph restriction after repair. Until January this year, the restriction was 20 mph after repair. That has been increased to 50 mph, and we should be grateful for that, but such restrictions knock the west country timetable sideways and throw it out of the window. The knock-on effects throughout the day mean that trains run unnecessarily late. The bulk of mainline repairs using modern equipment is done on weekday nights and at weekends, but not on the Reading to Taunton line. That means that on Sundays all passengers from Penzance upwards go via Bristol. I had such an experience on Sunday; I very regularly take five to six hours to get back to London by train. That is not acceptable on a Sunday, and the trains are packed as well.

Network Rail faces an enormous problem, but enormous problems were faced when I dealt with British Rail and Railtrack in the '80s and '90s. There have always been enormous problems with the track, and although it is true that more money is being spent—£46 million this year and £53 million next—on the Reading to Penzance route and that there is a high budget for track renewals, it remains true that even with a revised timetable it will be progressively more unlikely that trains will ever arrive according to their scheduled times.

That is the result not of breakdowns of engines or rolling stock, but simply of Network Rail commandeering sections of the track and forcing the railway to go on an alternative route. There are too many speed restrictions, they are too onerous, and more imaginative and progressive ways must be found to deal with engineering requirements. However, I am impressed by the spirit with which Network Rail is addressing such matters: the regional controller for the area is very enthusiastic and hopes that he can deliver—but there have been such hopes for the past 25 years.

The centrality of the track problem to the whole issue is illustrated by the fact that if the engineers upgraded the track from Reading to Taunton so that high-speed trains could travel at 125 mph rather than 110 mph, Exeter, Plymouth and Penzance could be reached much faster.

As the programme of track replacement proceeds, with a quarter of it having to be relaid in the next three years, it is important that deeper and thicker rails should be laid and not cheaper ones from eastern Europe. Will the Minister confirm that the best steel will be used and that the general quality and design will last for years to come?

There are further obstacles that will have to be surmounted, given the entire refit of Reading station and the introduction of Crossrail. Those two developments must not be used as an excuse for further delays, but inevitably they will. I am doubtful whether we will be able to go from Plymouth to London by train in three hours; it will be nearer four or five hours—that is why people take to the road.

Last but not least, I turn to the track at Dawlish. Climate change is already adversely affecting it: raised sea levels are causing more regular spray on to the track and halting services. On a recent visit to the Met Office in Exeter, I was left in no doubt by the forecasters that in the next 50 years rising sea levels will mean that the line beyond to Penzance will be closed for more days each year. Yet Network Rail and the Government continue to reject any suggestion that I make about providing, or even preparing for, an alternative route. An Exeter to Plymouth line along the A38 would, of course, solve that problem, as well as having other clear advantages.

The west country has only one line each way from Exeter to Penzance, and we have an outdated line, which is too slow, between Reading and Exeter. Major repairs are afoot. Reading station is to be brought into the 21st century—thank you, but at what cost?—and Crossrail is to bring trains from all over the north of the country straight down to the channel tunnel and the south coast. All in all, there is a massive programme for change, but today, public train services to and from the west country have in no way improved and in many cases have dramatically declined.

No wonder more and more people are taking to the roads in droves: their journeys are faster and cost dramatically less. This debate is an indictment of the Government's commitment to public transport and a reminder to those of us who live in the west country that they have little time for us and little regard for how we live our lives and the economic prosperity of the region. The Government could do a great deal to put things right. If the Minister has the will, there will be a way—but has he the will?

There are appalling delays on the railways, overcrowded out-of-date rolling stock and a railway company desperate to see things improve but hampered by the lack of basic requirements: a first-class track, reliable signalling and good communications systems. That lack will lead to ever greater congestion on the roads and ever increasing CO_2 emissions.

I have delayed asking for a debate on this issue for 20 years, because each year I hope that things will get better. However, the situation has got worse. In its original state, the new franchise timetable would have been an unmitigated disaster. The only chink of light is that First Great Western has won the new franchise and is as determined as I am to see, in my lifetime, improved, reliable, fast, comfortable and reasonably priced public rail travel.

9.59 am

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): I apologise to Members in the Chamber as I shall not be able to observe the usual courtesies and prolong my presence here beyond my speech. I am going to uphold the honour of the Commons against the Lords in a charity swim that is a long-standing commitment. I hope that Members will forgive me.

It is an enormous pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen), whose knowledge of rail matters is well known. From his comments, it is clear that his postbag, like mine, has been filled with letters expressing concerns about the rail service in the south-west.

Rail transport in the south-west has been one of the dominant issues that I have encountered since I became the Member for Plymouth, Devonport a year ago. The transport needs of the south-west are many, including air and road links, and they are all equally vital. It is the largest geographical region in the country, and it is very sparsely populated. If we are to avoid complete dependence on the car, branch lines feeding into cities such as Plymouth are essential, as are inter-city links.

Plymouth, which suffers serious peripherality concerns, is a city with an ambitious growth strategy. There are plans to increase its population significantly, by up to 50,000 people. Our economy is doing well. Our skyline is marked out with cranes, and business is looking favourably at the city. However, all those inquiring about establishing in Plymouth ask what the rail links are like. Rail journeys in the south-west have generally increased; they are up by 42 per cent. since 1995. A fifth of the journeys end in London, which indicates just how important the inter-city links are, particularly for business. We need those fast links, and the three-hour journey is essential. We also need the branch lines and the cross-country links that bring workers to workplaces, students to schools and universities, and people to the city for shopping or playing, and for their entertainment generally.

Historically, we have been living with the threat to our rail links. It was thought in 2004, following a detailed consultation, that we had got a timetable with which we could all work. The 2004 timetable seems simply to have been junked, despite the broad support for it, during discussion of what was needed after the Railways Act 2005. That point has been well made. People in the industry, who have much more experience than I do in such matters and who understand the intricacies of rail timetables, did not understand and were not happy with the process that followed that Act. The fact that the detail of the timetable was treated as commercially sensitive and was not published early on along with all the other franchise documentation caused problems.

The people who were best placed to spot the anomalies, clashes and gaps in services—the rail users—were not brought into the process, except by the back door, when people got leaked copies of the timetable. That is not how things should be. The users of the service well understand whether their connections will work or whether, as was the case in the proposed timetable, two trains are scheduled on the same piece of line at the same time. Given that the Secretary of State had inferred prior to the opening of the franchise process that he did not intend to cross all the t's and dot all the i's, we were all surprised at the degree of detail that was apparent in the franchise when we saw the detail of the timetable.

That proved not to be the final word on the matter. There did seem to be some flexibility for the franchisee to make changes. First Great Western listened to the issues that colleagues from across the region and I raised, along with other lobbyists and members of the public, and it has made some changes: there will be four three-hour journey services for Plymouth, not one, and many of the local routes have been reintroduced. However, the vague language sometimes used by First Great Western gives me cause for worry. Terms such as "expected to" and "may" are used in its press releases. Expectation is one thing, reality is another. That is why I am seeking a meeting with Alison Forster, the managing director of First Great Western, and MPs from all parties to discuss, and I hope nail down, some of the suggested changes.

We also want to discuss the concerns raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) about the subsidy and the rail utilisation strategy. The final document has only just been released, although it was apparently published to inform the development of the Government's specification for the south-west franchise. It all seems a little late in the day.

Mr. Drew: I must declare an interest: I have a strong link with the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers. Research that it has done for me suggests that First Great Western will do very well out of the franchise arrangement. The Government would also say that they do well, but they do so latterly in the way in which the franchise has been agreed. The missing variable is the degree to which First Great Western has predicated its figures on a substantial reduction in labour costs. Anyone who travels on its trains will know that after 6 o'clock they are denuded of staff. As a group of MPs, should we not take that issue up, to ensure that those staff costs are not cut?

Alison Seabeck: I agree with my hon. Friend, who I hope will join me in the meeting with First Great Western so that we can raise some of those issues directly. I am sure that he will also raise them when he speaks to the Minister.

I hope that the Minister will take away from this debate the strength of feeling that exists in our region and a sense of the importance of rail services to the south-west. I am sure that he will do so, and that he understands that we want further changes in the timetable. Anything that he can do to bring pressure on First Great Western to tweak it further would be welcome. We also ask him to accept the lessons learned from the handling of this first franchise operation and to avoid mistakes when we come to the handling of the cross-country franchise. Will he re-examine the sensitivity issues relating to the publication of the detail of the timetable and therefore enable valuable input from users, whose contribution will otherwise be restricted to generalities? If such things are not done, we will undoubtedly end up back in Westminster Hall in the months after the franchise is awarded and exactly the same concerns will be raised. We all want to avoid that.

Will the Minister also ensure that issues such as platform length are considered as part of the cross-country franchise? I understand that there is scope for some of the cross-country trains to make additional stops to fill in some of the gaps in the First Great Western franchise, but that some of those trains are too long for the existing platforms. If platforms need to be lengthened, there will be investment issues. If the trains are to keep some of their doors shut in order to stop at such stations, there will be health and safety issues. Such issues have been raised with me by members of the public. All those matters need to be resolved before the next franchise is finally awarded.

I would love people in the south-west and beyond to feel the romantic allure of the trains, which was so eloquently described by the hon. Member for Totnes. Unless we can provide a regular and reliable service, we will be unable to coax people even into considering using the railway. The car is far too easy an option and is so much quicker in many instances.

Mr. Ancram: I take the hon. Lady's point, but does she not agree that cars are for those who have them? Many people do not have them, particularly in the rural environment. If there are no trains and an insufficient number of buses, such people cannot get anywhere. That is why I hope that the Government will closely examine the effect of service closures in rural areas.

Alison Seabeck: The right hon. and learned Gentleman makes an important point. One often hears Government officials and others talking about improvements in bus services filling in the gaps caused by the lack of train services. Unfortunately, although there has been some improvement in rural bus services, which we should acknowledge, they still do not meet the demands that exist in the wider Devon area. We need people to be able to get into Plymouth to spend money.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, and to the hon. Member for Totnes for calling for this important debate. I represent a largely urban area. The issue for me is the number of people from rural communities such as Chippenham, Melksham and other towns in Wiltshire who will be travelling in by car if train services are cut. The Swindon-Southampton service, for example, is threatened with cuts. We need people to come in by train and not by car for our urban areas to remain viable. Does my hon. Friend agree?

Alison Seabeck: My hon. Friend reinforces my earlier point: such lines are important to Plymouth for exactly those reasons. They bring in money and people to support the urban economy, which in turn supports the wider rural hinterland.

I hope that the Minister will acknowledge our concerns in his winding-up speech, and offer a positive indication of progress for us to take away from this morning's debate.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Before I call the next speaker, I must inform hon. Members that I shall call the Front-Bench spokespeople from 10.30 am.

10.9 am

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Chope; I shall be mercifully brief.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on securing this debate. It might have been 20 years delayed, but it is extremely timely, because there is hardly a bigger issue in the far south-west than its train service. I commend the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck), as she disappears. She has taken a leading role in securing a better train service from the Government and First Great Western, and I pay tribute to her for doing so. Her performance has been impressive and I appreciated what she said in this debate.

I also thank the Government for their part in the change of mind about the three-hour service from London to Plymouth. I am unsure how it came about. I know that First Great Western had a major hand in it. It was of immense strategic importance to Plymouth that it secured that change of heart. The service is a vital lifeline for the city of Plymouth, which is the economic engine for the far south-west: Devon and Cornwall. It was critical that that three-hour journey, made four times a day, remained in place. I am grateful that that seems to have been the position, but I share the anxiety of the hon. Member that it needs to be nailed down and secured to ensure that the three-hour train journey remains in place.

As you well know, Mr. Chope, those of us in the far south-west, which is what I like to call Devon and Cornwall, live in a very peripheral part of the country. The solution to peripherality is first-class transport links. We heard from my hon. Friend about the difficulties caused by everyone piling on to the roads at certain times of the day and year. Our roads system is clogged up and there seems to be no more scope in that regard. It is therefore crucial that our rail links are excellent, which brings me to my main point. I shall focus for a few minutes on one specific fallout from the new specification and new timetable: the impact on the commuter town of Ivybridge, just 10 miles east of Plymouth.

As I hope the Minister knows, Ivybridge station has been in place since the early 1990s at a cost of £1.5 million of public money. We would all accept that it has been slow to become a viable train station, for various reasons. However, in the past two or three years, usage of Ivybridge station for commuter and student transport, both from Ivybridge to Plymouth and from Plymouth to Ivybridge college, particularly in the mornings, has been growing steadily.

Studies suggest that in the past 12 months, usage of Ivybridge station has increased by 70 per cent., and that is probably an understatement for the simple reason that during the 10-minute journey from Ivybridge to Plymouth, the service provider has quite often not collected money or taken tickets, so certain lucky passengers have been able to travel free and their presence on the train has not been recorded. The 70 per cent. increase is probably an understatement of how, at last, the station is beginning to take off. More and more people are using it for park and ride. More and more people live in Ivybridge and commute to Plymouth on the 7.49 and 8.21 rail services and return on the 16.48 and the 17.50—how specific is this speech?—every day. That is a viable working service and it is growing.

We are about to have a new town on the east of Plymouth, just south of the A38, at Sherford. Sadly, that will only make the transport issues more difficult and complex. There will be more congestion than there is today, so we want Ivybridge station to have a viable and flourishing future. Sadly, the new timetable suggested by the Government and First Great Western blows Ivybridge station out of the water. Yes, people can still commute from Ivybridge to Plymouth to work, but they cannot get back again. Yes, young people can still catch a train from Plymouth to Ivybridge to go to school, but they cannot get home again. What is the point of that? The new timetable cuts the number of trains calling at Ivybridge by a significant percentage.

We have had a number of meetings about the issue, which is of great importance to the local community. We had one meeting just before Easter. The senior director for transport at the Government office for the south-west, Mr. Richard Bayly, attended and listened to representations at a packed Ivybridge town hall. He said that he would look into whether the Government and First—its representatives were there, too—could come up with a viable timetable for Ivybridge station and for Ivybridge commuters and students.

The time scale is now very short, so I urge the Minister to deal with the matter. He may never have been to Ivybridge or even have heard of Ivybridge—I hope that he has—but I ask him to find a way in the next two or three weeks, before the timetable is settled, to put in place a viable train timetable for the commuters and students of Ivybridge. At the moment, the timetable is not viable and that will sound the death knell for the station, which was constructed using vast sums of public money. I assure him that the station is a facility that will be used increasingly in the future. We therefore have to find a solution to the problem.

May I suggest one possible solution? A number of Virgin trains go through Ivybridge every day, but they do not stop because they are longer than the platform. In extremis, it is possible for a train that is too long for a platform to stop at the station and for the guard to announce that people who want to get off should not do so from the two end carriages or they will do themselves a nasty injury, and to say that they should get off from the designated coaches. That might be an interim solution. I understand that if the Government can satisfy Virgin on that point, it would be prepared to have some of its trains stop at Ivybridge.

The estimated cost of extending the platform at Ivybridge by 10 metres is £100,000. Given the amount of subsidy being invested in the railways today and the amount of money that the Government spend year in, year out—I appreciate that there are different jam jars and that that money might be for Network Rail and so on—I ask the Minister to do some joined-up thinking and to ask for a discussion with the railway operators, with Network Rail and with his own officials. Is it not possible to increase the length of the platform at Ivybridge, so that Virgin inter-city trains can stop there as well? That would facilitate a proper commuter service, so that people could go from Ivybridge to Plymouth to work and back again and students could come from Plymouth to Ivybridge and get home again safely without having to hang around at the station for an hour and a half, which many parents are worried about. Is that not a simple practical solution?

I do not expect the Minister to have all the detail relating to this matter at his fingertips when he winds up the debate, but will he please consider urgently the provision of a viable train timetable for Ivybridge?

10.16 am

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on initiating the debate.

My constituents are feeling pretty sore at the moment. Not only is the Secretary of State for Health pursuing a scorched-earth policy as far as our local community hospitals are concerned, but it appears that we face the prospect of many of our rail links disappearing, so we are pretty unhappy. I hope that the Minister will be able to cheer us up a little. I am grateful to him for meeting me last month with members of the west Wiltshire rail users group and representatives of the town councils. We appreciated that meeting and we hope very much that, as a costed option, the service that runs from Bristol to London Waterloo will be back on track.

I shall principally address two elements of the rail transport network that runs through my constituency. The Minister will know that Westbury is a railway town. People in Westbury and the surrounding areas feel strongly about trains. They are very much part of the local scene, as I hope he understands. Several lines—several little bits of the rail network—run through Westbury. I want to mention in particular the Westbury-Swindon link. On Friday, I had the pleasure of meeting members of the south-west public transport users forum in Trowbridge. They put a number of points to me about the Great Western franchise, and the Westbury-Swindon link featured large in the discussion. There is concern about the high level of cancellations for that service, dirty dilapidated rolling stock, poor connections at Westbury and poor timetabling. That all leads to a general disinclination on the part of the travelling public to use the service.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): My hon. Friend mentions the service from Swindon to Westbury and onwards. That service goes through Chippenham in my constituency, where a significant number of people use that line down through west Wiltshire. Under the proposals, which, rather bizarrely, the Government are signing off—it should be First Great Western, but the Government are actually to blame—the trains from Chippenham down towards Southampton are being cut. Is that not a disgrace?

Dr. Murrison: Indeed it is. If the proposals go ahead, we shall see a massive reduction in the service: it will be down to about 20 per cent. of its current level. Basically, it will become a vestigial service. We are now several years into the 10-year transport plan, but goodness me, where are we going if we are seeing such a situation in an area where the population is growing all the time? We know from the regional spatial strategy for the south-east and south-west that we expect an increase of upwards of 200,000 dwellings. My constituency and those of my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) will be heavily involved in that growth. In all our areas, the road network is creaking and is going to get worse, and corridors such as the one that I have described will be increasingly important.

As I said in the debate on rail transport in the south-east in January—the Minister may recall it—to get people to travel by train, we have to make travelling by train attractive. It simply is not possible to set up a train service and say, "Here you are, here's your train. Get on with it." My hon. Friend the Member for Totnes said that the Chinese would simply set up a railway. They may very well do that, but in our country the difference is that we have to make it attractive to people to travel by train. We do not have that kind of command economy. We have to make using the train attractive to the travelling public, and unfortunately that is not happening.

Mr. Ancram: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a real paradox here? While these trains may not be particularly attractive, I have figures from the Melksham ticket sales office, and over the past three years, usage has increased from 3,000 to 27,000. More and more people are using the trains, whether they are attractive or not. In the face of that increase, it seems perverse to start talking about cutting services when more and more people are using them.

Dr. Murrison: My right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. No doubt he will have heard, as I have, from the redoubtable Melksham Without parish council about its concerns regarding the siting of Melksham station and its facilities.

The line from south Wales to Bristol to the south coast is extremely important. It runs through a number of wards that have some of the highest indices of deprivation in our country. The Minister probably shares the prejudices of many in his party in believing that such wards exist only in the midlands and the north. That is simply not the case. From the suburbs of Southampton right up to the Severn estuary and Bristol, such wards exist in large numbers. Public transport is important to many of our constituents.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): The hon. Gentleman refers to a line that has exercised me greatly. Is he aware that only in 2004, additional carriages were introduced on the Cardiff to Portsmouth route, which runs through his constituency, as a consequence of discussions with the Department for Transport? The new franchise timetable plans to make yet further reductions, however, making the service completely unusable for people who want to go to work, college or school.

Dr. Murrison: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that intervention. The theme that she mentions seems to be a recurring one, because the Waterloo to Bristol service was commended by the Minister's predecessors. Following the network user strategy of 2003, it was scheduled to be enhanced. We were going to get more trains, but now we find that that particular service is going to be axed completely, unless it can continue through a costed option under the new franchise from February 2007. We are suffering from a stop-start service, and the difficulty is that once people are used to not using a service, they will not go back to it. We found that in west Wiltshire; there needs to be continuity so that people get into the habit of using rail transport.

The south coast to Bristol to south Wales railway route is the second most heavily used passenger railway in the west of England: its use is exceeded only by the M4 corridor route that links the west of England with London. That is a very important point, which the Minister must understand. More than 5 million passenger journeys are made each year and growth in use is about 8 per cent. per annum, but we find that this particular service is scheduled for wholesale reductions. That is simply unacceptable.

In the Bristol and Bath to south coast study, endorsed by the South West regional assembly and drawn up by Government office for the south-west, we saw that this route was considered important. I hope that the Minister has examined a letter on this subject dated yesterday—he probably has not seen it yet, but I hope he will do so shortly—from the Cabinet member for the environment, transport and economic development, Councillor de Rhé Philipe. It is signed off by chief executives of Bristol city council, Wiltshire county council, West Wiltshire district council and Salisbury district council, and by the chairman of the South West regional assembly planning and transport committee. They all stress the points that I have articulated today. I hope that the Minister reads the letter. It is a good letter that sets out the points very clearly and relates particularly to an extremely valuable link.

In the time available, I should like briefly to mention the Bristol to Waterloo service, which is a vital service for my constituents. I know that the Minister will consider the matter carefully as the preferred bidders put their plans forward. It is a costed option, and I hope that he will use that as one of the foremost criteria when deciding which of the preferred bidders should run this important service.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on securing what has been an excellent debate so far. I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), particularly because of his last remarks on the crucial service to Waterloo.

If we are going to get people on to the railways and out of their cars, as the hon. Member for Totnes wants to do, we must ensure that we have a safe, reliable and affordable public transport system. At the moment, the train journey from Bath to Paddington is not only one of the most expensive in this country, but almost one of the most expensive in the world. Fortunately, there is currently an alternative—the route to Waterloo. Although it takes longer, it is significantly cheaper. For that reason, and many others, I hope that the Minister will listen carefully to what has been said about the crucial need to maintain the Bristol Temple Meads to Waterloo route when the South West Trains franchise is renewed.

We have heard from the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) about the importance of the timetable, but there are other crucial issues. Affordability is one and capacity is another. It is deeply disturbing that the current proposals will reduce the number of carriages in some of the crucial commuter trains through, for example, Freshford, Keynsham—it is wonderful to see the hon. Member for Wansdyke (Dan Norris), who represents Keynsham, here today—and Oldfield Park. The number of carriages on those trains is to be reduced at peak times, which will cause a huge problem.

It is also crucial that we have timetable that is fit for purpose and delivers what is needed. I referred briefly in an earlier intervention to letters that I received from the Minister on 9 August and 13 September, which refer to the three stations of Freshford, Oldfield Park and Keynsham. In those letters, he assured me that there will be an hourly service at off-peak times and two trains per hour at peak time. He made it absolutely clear that these plans were his "Department's intentions for these stations."

He went on to say:

"This is to be made clear to the bidders for the franchise."

Sadly, however, we see that that is not being delivered in any of those three stations.

There is a difficulty. Since the initial plans were produced, about 9,000 letters of complaint have been received by First Great Western. As we heard from the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport, consideration has been given to some of those concerns. In about six weeks' time, we shall hear the outcome of that process, and we understand that some of the concerns raised have now been resolved. It would be enormously helpful to my constituents if the Minister would confirm today that the problem of the reduction of services through those three stations is one of the issues that has been resolved. If not, I urge him to consider carefully concerns about the reduction in the number of carriages on peak routes, and I ask him in particular to ensure that we retain the crucial Temple Meads to Waterloo service.

Mr. Geoffrey Cox (Torridge and West Devon) (Con): I shall be as brief as I possibly can and confine my remarks to specific matters relating to the Tamar valley line in my constituency.

The position regarding the Tamar valley line is that it is a community rail pilot. The Government approve of community rail and have expressed warm sentiments about the line on numerous occasions. They have done so to such an extent that when the question of the timetable arose, I wrote to the Minister, and I hope that he recollects writing back to me on 18 October 2005. The crucial issue regarding the Tamar valley line is that the eight trains a day that currently run should be retained. I have received communications from many in that area of my constituency, including the parish councils, and it is clear that the early morning service is vital in order to provide connections through Plymouth to the rest of the country. Its removal in the present timetable will cause hardship to literally dozens, perhaps even hundreds, of people.

In the letter of 18 October, the Minister assured me—and through me, my constituents—that that service would be retained, that eight trains a day would be guaranteed and that the principle and policy of reflecting the Government's support of the community rail partnership and the community railway of the Tamar valley line would be honoured. I regret to say that the timetable now published demonstrates that that will not happen. I hope that he will do all in his power to ensure that his assurance, which I publicised to my constituents throughout my constituency, will indeed be honoured. Faith in this Government, reliance on their word and the solidity of their assurances to people in my constituency are at stake.

The Minister will be fully aware that the connections that can be made using the first morning service mean that many people in remote and isolated parts of my constituency can go to work even as far afield as London. If the service is withdrawn, there are those who will be unable to work and forced to move. I hope that the Minister will pay earnest attention to my constituents' concerns about the Tamar valley line, and give me the assurances that I look for today.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on securing this debate. The number of Members present from all parties shows the level of concern about the new timetable, which will be implemented from December. Like other hon. Members, I hope that we will hear from the Minister some reassurances that there will be changes to what is now the second revision to the original published timetable.

We know why we are in this situation: three franchises have been combined into one, and one operator, First Great Western, has taken responsibility. Earlier on, Mr. Steen referred to the work that First Great Western has done since the protest by many people in the south-west. I want to consider what lies behind those problems, at what the continuing problems are and at what the Minister must do. We know that investment is needed, but as Mr. Steen said, that has been evident for many years.

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Order. It is customary to refer to hon. Members by their constituency names.

Paul Rowen: I am sorry, Mr. Chope.

The issue is the franchise specification. I want to read part of it, because it explains and underlines why we are in this situation. It says that the franchise "will be one of the first in which bids are made against a precisely specified base case."

In other words, we are in this situation because the Department for Transport has specified precisely what will and will not be provided. I think that we are seeing certain changes—I am thinking in particular of the threat to rural lines and interconnecting services to main lines—because the franchise specification says that the deployment of resources should

"as effectively as possible ... reflect growing demand in the London area".

The franchise is London-centric, and it does not meet the needs of people in the south-west.

Many hon. Members have referred to the issues affecting their constituencies. First, the timetable is not fit for purpose in terms of capacity. It does not provide enough seating capacity, so on the Westbury, Bath and Bristol Temple Meads to Cardiff Central line, the Exeter St. David's to Exmouth line, and the Exeter Central to Torbay line, there is insufficient capacity to meet demand.

The second issue is customer flow. The specification takes no account of existing usage or of some of the improvements that, for example, Wessex Trains made through the wider benefits programme in order to build on growing demand. As the hon. Member for Totnes said, there has been a 40 per cent. increase in demand on rural lines. However, the new timetable has no train arrival at Exeter St. David's from Barnstaple between 7.44 am and 9.40 am. What are commuters who want to go to Exeter going to do? There is no train arrival at Weymouth from Bristol, Westbury or Yeovil before 9.31 am. What about students going to Weymouth college, and other commuters? There is no westbound train departure from Truro to Penzance between 16.24 and 18.40. In other words, one time is too early for Truro college students to get home, and the other is too late for commuters.

Mr. Gray: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that taking account of where people live and the growth in rail usage should include not only the timetable, but the potential for new stations? Does he not agree that there is a strong case for a new station at, for example, Corsham in my constituency? It is a fast-growing area, with many people commuting to the constituency of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster).

Paul Rowen: I agree entirely. There was a golden opportunity in the timetable for the Government to demonstrate their commitment to rail services by building in those services. However, the fact of the matter is that we have gone backwards in terms of the services that Wessex Trains provides, for example. Train services are not fit for purpose, and they will not meet the needs of local communities. We know the result: people will go back on to the roads, increasing traffic congestion and CO_2 emissions, and the train service will not be improved.

Dr. Murrison: Notwithstanding the hon. Gentleman's comments about CO_2 emissions and his party's antipathy towards cars, does not he accept that in rural areas in particular, a multi-modal approach is important? My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) is concerned about the situation at Salisbury station, where it is difficult to park a car, which means that it is difficult for people to use rail transport, particularly if they are commuting. Does the hon. Gentleman not agree?

Paul Rowen: I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can say that my party has an antipathy towards cars. However, as he said, we need joined-up solutions. In rural areas where there are no buses, people must be allowed to travel from their homes to the station so as to get on the train to their next destination.

I return to some more examples. The timetable for the Severn Beach line does not take account of its high usage by schoolchildren.

Stephen Williams (Bristol, West) (LD): My hon. Friend has been very generous with interventions. He mentioned the Severn Beach line and, earlier, interconnectivity with mainline services. I would dearly like to use the Severn Beach line to make my journey from Bristol Temple Meads to Paddington. Frequently I cannot, however, because the service ends at Temple Meads, giving passengers three minutes flat to get from one end of the station to the other in order to get the London service. I am sure that the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Dr. Naysmith) will empathise with the fact that for many people who would like to make the through journey, the constraints of the timetable make it impossible.

Paul Rowen: I agree entirely. We know about the difficulties between inter-city services, but there is also a lack of interconnectivity between those services and local trains. We must factor in whether the timetable is deliverable. Several experts have said that as currently constructed, it is not. There are three instances every day whereby trains travelling in opposite directions are timetabled to meet on a single line between Kemble and Swindon. That is ridiculous.

Time is short, and before the timetable is published, those issues must be considered afresh. We need a commitment from the Minister and First Great Western to resolve them. First is committed to provide £1.13 billion to the Government over 10 years. Some of that money must be reinvested in local services, otherwise the situation will get worse.

One of my hon. Friends, who cannot attend today's debate, said to me that an underlying plot is in operation. First Group runs buses as well as trains in the area, and it would be useful for the group if many of the rural branch lines were replaced with bus services. There is one example of that in the timetable. The Avonmouth-Severn Beach service is being replaced with a bus. If rural lines are being decimated for fast interconnectivity city lines to London, that will be at the expense of many people.

I hope that the Minister will consider those issues with First. The people of the south-west deserve better. We have had an excellent debate today and I hope that those concerns will be listened to.

10.41 am

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): Like the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen), I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on securing this debate. My hon. Friend's eloquence has brought colour to it as much as his fashion statement and glasses. I was elected last year and I am grateful to him for his kind advice and hospitality over the past year.

This is an important debate because clearly underlying it is the philosophy that we have discussed about the possible movement from cars to trains. My hon. Friend emphasised the effect on the peninsula and the environment. The debate is also important because it goes to the heart of the problems with the railways and with how the rail industry is structured and how the franchise process is working. We have had some excellent contributions from hon. Members throughout the Chamber about the problem pertaining to their constituencies.

I am aware that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) has led a strong campaign in her area. Two months ago, the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) initiated a debate on South West Trains in her constituency and I suspected that we would have a debate such as this, so just before Easter I took the opportunity to go down to the west country to look at the problems in detail. I travelled by train from London to Plymouth, where I came across three or four major problems that the timetable is causing. First, points have already been made about high-speed trains and cutting the number of three-hour London-Plymouth services, as well as local services such as those from Ivybridge and St. Germans.

In Plymouth I met local councillors, the local press and especially local railway officials, which was an enlightening experience because it gave me real insight into how the bidding process for the franchise worked and what lobbying is taking place by FirstGroup with the Government for revision of the timetable. I also met local business men, which was crucial. Tim Jones of the Devon and Cornwall Business Council stressed to me that the three-hour train is vital for Plymouth's success. We have heard Plymouth described as a vibrant and growing city. The regional spatial and economic strategies highlight Plymouth as an area of expansion. The point that was made was that if the three-hour train service were to disappear, the business prospects in the area would also disappear.

While I was in the west country I took the opportunity to look at the Looe-Liskeard line and the impact on local businesses and local employment of people being able to connect with trains to Plymouth and beyond, such as on the Penzance-Plymouth line. All those issues underlie a problem. If the timetable that came into place on, appropriately, 1 April—it replaced the December 2004 timetable, which is being junked—is not revised it will have severe implications for the peninsula.

Equally, my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) made a point about the importance of the route from the south coast to Bristol and south Wales. The south coast to Bristol and south Wales corridor links the major urban settlements of south Hampshire, greater Bristol, greater Bath, Wiltshire and south Wales with the lines to London. The regional spatial strategy and the regional economic strategy highlight those as areas of growth in housing and economic development. The proposals for those areas are to cut services, and existing passengers will find themselves on shorter and less frequent trains, with services starting later in the morning and dwell times at stations being cut. The inevitable implication is overcrowding and the inevitable consequence is that people will be less likely to use the trains.

Mr. Don Foster: The hon. Gentleman referred to growing towns. The town of Frome is growing enormously and he may be surprised to know that under the proposed timetable there is no train between 7 o'clock and 9 o'clock in the morning from Frome to Bath, where most of the work is.

Mr. Hammond: I did not know that, but I am not surprised. That is a consequence of the proposed timetable, and the same is happening throughout the west and south-west. Such reductions will be a real problem when trying to persuade local people to go to local urban centres and centres of regional economic development. That will be a major consequence, and people will either lose employment or be forced into their cars with all the consequences for the environment that my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes has described.

Mr. Cox: Another example of which my hon. Friend may not be aware, although I hope that the Minister is aware of it, is that the train service on the Tarka line from Barnstable to Exeter has had removed from it any train that arrives in Exeter for the peak rush hour. That is a clear example of what my hon. Friend is saying.

Mr. Hammond: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that important point. We have heard a number of comments from other hon. Members about lines being cut. We have not said much about Hampshire, but clearly the timetable has implications for Hampshire. I shall not continue to detail the cuts because I want to leave time for the Minister to reply, as do most hon. Members.

While I was in Plymouth I had a good indication from FirstGroup about how the bidding process worked. It is important to understand that First is trying to work with local people and to lobby the Government to revise the current timetable, but following the Railways Act 2005 and the demise of the Strategic Rail Authority, the Secretary of State for Transport is effectively running the railways. He is doing that not only strategically, but by intervening in the minutiae of the railways. Under the franchise process for the route in question all bidders were asked to supply three bids, one for a minimum service level which was specified in detail by the Government—the detailed specification option—one on the original timetable and one on an optimum timetable for the route. It is no surprise that the timetable that has been granted and for which First is paying £1 billion over 10 years for the privilege to operate is the detailed specification option.

On 20 March, I asked the Minister to tell me how many rail routes would be cut as a result of that detailed specification and how many stations would be closed. His answer was none. I suspect that that revolved around the word "cut". If I had asked how many service reductions there would be as a result of that detailed specification option, I suspect that I would have received a different answer.

One matter that will be clear to all hon. Members from the debate is that the current timetable, which started on 1 April, is not fit for purpose. FirstGroup has impressed on me and, I am sure, other hon. Members who had discussions with it, that it is negotiating with the Government to revise the timetable so that when the final version is published in the first week of December a number of the issues that we have heard about today may be resolved. I hope that the Minister will today give us some guarantees about the three-hour London-Plymouth service and local commuter services in Ivybridge and respond to the comments made by my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) about the Bristol-Waterloo service and a number of the other implications for west Wiltshire. We look forward to the Minister giving us those guarantees.

10.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I shall try to deal with as many issues as I possibly can in the short time available. First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on securing this debate. He is a real rail enthusiast and has always taken a special interest in railways, particularly in his part of the country. I shall deal quickly with a few points made by other hon. Members and then address some of his concerns.

I cannot give the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) a detailed answer on the point that he raised, but I shall write to him about it as soon as possible. My officials are working on the specific issue about service that the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) mentioned, and I shall get in touch with him as soon as we have a firmer answer on it. The hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) asked about services at Ivybridge. Obviously, we are considering more options for additional services, but the normal procedure for enhancements such as those to platforms is a business case, and involves talking to Network Rail and so on. I am not sure what stage the matter is at, whether it is just an initial idea or whether there are ongoing discussions. If I hear of anything on that, I shall write to him, but I am not aware of anything at present.

I understand that most Members are here today because they are not happy with various things, but we must consider the bigger picture. It is important to remember that these are good times for the railways. A record amount is being spent—£87 million each week—and, on average, train performance is above the target of 85 per cent. that we had for March this year. More than 85 per cent. of trains run on time, and many train operating companies are now hitting 90 per cent. and above. There has been a significant improvement in reliability and significant investment in rolling stock, with about one third of it being replaced.

It is not the case that people have been put off using the railways. Last year, there were more than 1 billion passenger journeys—a further increase. There are more passengers than there have been since the early 1960s on what is, compared with the pre-Beeching railway, a smaller railway. That is a significant improvement.

On the comment of the hon. Member for Totnes about FirstGroup, it put in a bid for the franchise because it obviously thinks that it is a good commercial proposition. It believes, as do we, that the number of passengers will continue to grow.

It is important to give some background. It was clear from the start that specifying the service to be provided by the new Great Western operator would be an intricate task. We must balance issues of affordability, service, value for money and performance when awarding a franchise. At the same time, this is a truly regional franchise that brings together services of all types: inter-city, inter-urban, commuter, local and rural. By contrast, most previous franchises tended to be of one particular service type.

The Great Western franchise is a particularly large and detailed franchise. It also operates across a wide geographical area including, for example, parts of London, the Thames valley, the south midlands, Bath, Bristol, south Wales and the south-west peninsula. That makes it one of the most operationally complex franchises on the network.

One of the great benefits of the new franchise is that it allows us to ensure that Network Rail has to deal with just one train operator across most of the network west of Paddington. That should bring real advantages for passengers, too. For example, it will greatly simplify the operation of major stations on the routes for Paddington, Bristol Temple Meads and Reading.

The core of the specification is the service level commitment, which typically lays down the minimum number of trains that must run on each route, the time of early morning and late evening services, journey times and calling patterns. However, the Government do not specify every aspect of a service. For example, rolling stock, which hon. Members have mentioned, is largely a matter for bidders, who must ensure that trains can achieve the speeds needed to deliver the service, and that there is enough rolling stock to meet the operator's own forecast of demand.

Fares, too, are a matter for the franchisee, provided they comply with the Government's policy on regulated fares. Increases on such fares are limited annually to 1 per cent. above the rate of increase in the retail prices index. I probably ought to mention as well that catering on trains, a subject which is of great interest to the hon. Member for Totnes—he has previously raised it with me—is entirely a matter for bidders to propose.

In short, we aim for a specification that is detailed enough to ensure that value for money for the taxpayer is properly balanced against the needs of passengers. At the same time, we recognise that operators, not Ministers or civil servants, are experts in delivering train services. We therefore leave to them as much of the operational detail as is reasonably possible.

The point that I would like to stress more than any other before I move on to other issues is that the operator is free to vary train times and to amend calling patterns, provided the minimum standards set out in the service level commitment are met. Crucially, they can also operate extra trains, provided there is sufficient track capacity and no adverse effect on other operators' subsidies or premiums.

Tenders for the new franchise were received in September 2005, and, as we all know, the franchise was awarded to FirstGroup. It is worth emphasising that FirstGroup has committed itself to £220 million investment over the first three years of the franchise in return for the right to run it, and that that will deliver a range of benefits to passengers. There will be a complete redesign of the high-speed train fleet, at a cost of some £140 million, which will increase by 14 per cent. the number of seats on commuter and long-distance trains to and from London in the peak periods. There will be a programme of station improvements, including better customer information systems, 1,700 new car parking places and, crucially, at a time when there is great concern about passenger safety at stations, improvements in passenger security through the upgrading of CCTV at stations across the network.

Also, there will be revenue protection measures, including automatic ticket gates at principal stations. That is important for passengers, as detecting fare evasion tends to reduce other crime on the railway. The measures will be backed up by extra staff and the recruitment of more community support officers.

New performance and reliability targets will call for nine out of 10 trains to run on time by 2011–12. As the hon. Gentleman knows—he raised the issue with me recently—the sleeper service to Penzance, which many in the media predicted would be withdrawn, has been retained.

Once FirstGroup had been awarded the new franchise, it embarked on a consultation about the detailed service that it proposed to offer. As hon. Members have said, that attracted a considerable volume of responses, which tended to focus on objections about specific proposals. I hope that the extent to which it has been possible to meet the points that were raised in the consultation demonstrates that it was a genuine and helpful exercise. Inevitably, there will be some preferences that it has not been possible to cater for, but the service that we now expect when the new timetable is introduced will go a long way to satisfying the points that have been made. Of course, it will still be possible at various points during the lifetime of the franchise to offer additional services if the case can be made for them, but they must meet the criteria that I outlined.

Dan Norris (Wansdyke) (Lab): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, as I know that he has limited time. Could he possibly drop me a line along the lines of the one for the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), as the services at Keynsham in my constituency are to be reduced at commuter times? The capacity of the trains will also be reduced, and that is causing great concern.

Derek Twigg: I know that my hon. Friend takes a great interest in the train services in his constituency and is a good campaigner for them. Yes, I shall certainly write to him on that matter.

The hon. Member for Totnes mentioned track maintenance and infrastructure problems. Today's debate has highlighted the condition of the infrastructure, and I am aware of the concerns that have been expressed by hon. Members about the performance of FirstGroup and Network Rail in respect of the Great Western service. The principal causes of problems are track condition and the temporary speed restrictions that are imposed to maintain safe operation. Performance on the route remains unsatisfactory, but Network Rail reduced the delay minutes for track-related problems from 14,000 minutes per period at the start of the year 2005–06 to 10,000 minutes per period. It has a large programme of track renewals over a five to six year period and has invested in high-output track renewal plant that has been successful in reducing track-related faults. To reduce delays, it is working to increase the track handback speed following renewals from 50 mph to 80 mph. A recent programme of rail renewal has helped to reduce temporary speed restrictions, and Network Rail plans to spend additional money over the next five years on more than 100 schemes to improve Great Western performance.

An essential element of planning a train service specification is to give Network Rail reasonable access to the railway for maintenance and renewal. Generally, that requires possession, which involves a temporary closure of a section of railway to traffic. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the typical pattern is for routine track maintenance to be undertaken during midweek night possessions, when few passenger trains operate, and for renewal and larger maintenance projects to be done at weekends. At the same time, growing levels of rail traffic pose a challenge to Network Rail, which, if possible, must increase the rate of maintenance and renewal without increasing its demands for possessions.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Dawlish. It receives special attention from Network Rail. The line and sea wall are regularly monitored and receive enhanced maintenance. The foundations of vulnerable sections have been strengthened, and a team of five people work on the section throughout the year. Network Rail is not currently considering an alternative route. The monitoring and enhanced maintenance—

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Order. We must move on to the next debate.

Biotechnology Industry

11 am

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Biotechnology, or what is sometimes called the biosciences, is one of the UK economy's fastest growing sectors and its future looks rather bright. There are 455 bioscience companies in the UK, and about 22,500 people are employed in the industry's different sub-sectors. The industry is growing fast and can grow even faster, but it will not grow as fast as it might without Government support, because it is in a most competitive environment. The US has the biggest and fastest growing industry, as well as being more experienced, but India, China and other countries are coming up fast on the rails.

In health care at the end of 2005, the industry carried out deals worth £750 million, thereby contributing significantly to the economy. Indeed, it is in health care that most of the biggest effects are felt and most of the biggest discoveries are made. Article after article on the subject has appeared in the Financial Times, and journalist Lisa Urquhart has highlighted many of the features of the biosciences movement in recent articles. She notes that the business is risky because research is lengthy and costly periods of development are required. There are dozens of failures in the field, as well as endless calls for refinancing.

On the other hand, the sector is beginning to produce some real winners. One example, of which I was not aware, concerns marine biotechnology. Many compounds are being discovered in this planet's deep realms, which have not been investigated before. We have tended to look up, not down, but we are now finding new substances, which have great effects on cancer, heart disease and so on. Biosensors, which can detect pollution, can also be developed from organisms in the marine environment. Things are therefore beginning to move, and we want to encourage such developments, as well as those in the conventional drug arena.

Gene therapy in its wider sense is also on the agenda again. It is not a matter simply of injecting viruses into people to eradicate faulty genes, but of suppressing gene activity and so on. Much activity is going on in that respect, and although we do not have the blockbuster yet, it is not far off. Animal biotechnology experiments are also being done. They include, for example, experiments to make racehorses run faster. If I had a business, I might breed racehorses, win the Derby and retire quite happy without telling anyone. So lots is going on in that respect, too.

There is also the field of gene diagnostics, which allows us to assess which illnesses people might develop at different stages in their lives, and who will respond to certain drugs, which greatly benefits the national health service drug budget. In addition, we have all heard of the anti-cancer drug Herceptin and tissue engineering, and those, too, are part of biotechnology. New bladders are also being grown for children. New bird flu vaccines are being produced—perhaps not fast enough, but production is certainly speeding up—in case we should be struck down by that disease, as has happened in other parts of the world. As Lisa Urquhart notes, biotechnology has been

"catapulted . . . into the forefront of people's minds."

At the same time, however, there are the other stories. There was the tragic stem cell research in South Korea, the impact of which reverberated around the world. As has been well documented, the professor involved was tempted to rig the data, confusing the public and perhaps himself. In this country, six volunteers involved in tests on an experimental monoclonal antibody suffered an adverse reaction last month. We await the report, and everybody has their ideas about what went wrong there.

Still, biotechnology-produced drugs have become the most rapidly growing segment of the drug industry not only in this country but in Europe. In the past year, 23 compounds have come out of Europe and 13 have come out of the USA—activity has accelerated greatly. As Lisa Urquhart notes,

"confidence may have returned to Europe", and we should remember that that confidence was shattered by the unmentionable genetic modification. I promise never again to mention GM or to fall out with people in defence of GM crops—at least not until the next one appears. Despite that confidence, however, Lisa Urquhart notes that there is

"a shortage of mature, large, profitable European biotechnology companies for investors to sink either their teeth, or funds, into."

In America, however, we see quite the opposite. Companies' market capitalisation passes the $1 billion mark, and that trend is growing. I shall explain shortly how that has occurred.

There is huge international interaction. I mentioned the US, Europe and the UK, but there are interactions between Indian and Chinese companies and between Indian and British companies. Indeed, in the past few years, Singapore has suddenly not only recruited some of our best scientific stars but populated the market with large sums of money and seen the value of biotechnology in health and other areas. Biotechnology is indeed a burgeoning field.

At this point, I want to digress a little to talk about this country. It is reasonable to ask why biotechnology is growing in some areas and some cities but not in others. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me for mentioning Norwich and Norfolk, because there are few biotechnology companies there, but there are massive research institutes, including the biggest plant research institute in Europe. There is also a university with a medical school, which the Government provided in 1998. Special science schools are developing, where young people study astronomy, information technology and so on. We also have a biomedical centre, a pharmacy school and creative centres, which the public and young people can visit to try out scientific experiments online. On paper, those higher education establishments are as good as any, but why are no companies coming out of that?

Recently, in Norwich, I attended a glittering BAFTA-type awards ceremony full of entrepreneurs—they were to the left, to the right and in the middle. Many of them were young and were involved in developing films, in the media and in graphic design. It was quite inspiring, and I did not know that so much was going on in that area, but where is the equivalent in science, technology and medicine? Where are the young people who are being encouraged to develop their ideas and come for their glittering prizes?

Is there perhaps a lack of ambition in Norwich? No, that is the football team—sorry, Delia. Do we need a champion or even a tsar? Do we need an organisation to overthrow what I sometimes think is the dominance of Cambridge on the east coast? We certainly need a regional development agency such as that in the north-west, which knows what a science city is. It sees the glittering possibilities offered by those involved in the sector—from the very young to the very old—and it makes them work together to develop science and technology to the highest level. We have six such science cities in this country, and such bodies would provide a focus for collaboration in the sciences, including astronomy, and I note that Colin Pillinger is coming to Norwich this week to talk to young people and, I hope, at a mass meeting.

We want to get young people into computing. Tim Berners-Lee has said that computational science is the coming thing and he has a vision of our being able to model structures. As hon. Members will know, our understanding of climate change is based on models and on predicting what might happen in the future.

There is a lot that we should be doing. At the same time, there are vast natural resources in places such as East Anglia, where people should go and see for themselves what nature is. Susan Greenfield has been talking in the other place about the effects on the brain of using computers to blog and so on, asking what has happened to reading books and going to see things for oneself. That is absolutely right: not enough people are going out to the broads to hire boats—not to ram other boats, but to sail peacefully up the broads, which are a national park, and see the wildlife there.

We also have rich birdlife in north Norfolk. We find that many young people, for whatever reason—the Field Studies Council not having the support and money, for instance—are not getting out there to see nature for themselves. They are reduced—not badly, I guess—to watching David Attenborough's "The Blue Planet" on television to see what life is really like. We have to get out of that and do something much more radical. We have to get young people out there to see nature and to interact with the world face to face.

Biotechnology is developing in certain parts of the UK. For example, an alternative, junior stock market is being set up that harnesses support from different parts of the world. It has alternative listings from the UK and the US, including those involving stem cell research. I declare an interest: I am on the Stem Cell Foundation, with Richard Branson, Richard Sykes and many others. We are involved in the stem cell initiative, to which the Chancellor has given huge sums to develop stem cell research and biotechnology in this country. I am also involved in the East Anglian initiative, in association with people at Cambridge.

There was a time when big pharma ruled the roost, but it has recently found it difficult to keep up with the research initiatives from smaller companies and individuals. Big pharma cannot keep up with the new ideas, such as the new molecules and proteins that are being produced to treat illnesses, and the genomic science advances, as highlighted by developments at the Sanger institute.

There is massive potential for new technology in what are called RNA interference molecules, which are molecules that can induce the inaction of a particular gene or activity in a cell. The gene is knocked out rather than replaced, as in the crudest gene therapy. I see from various journals that 40 to 50 patents involving such technology have been applied for. There is huge development, not only through the patents but in new companies using the technology to develop new cures and treatments.

Such research is exciting, but it is outside big pharma. Big pharma is quite a courageous group of individuals and organisations—it sees what is happening and is taking up a new position. It does not want contracts any more, but a relationship in which the work is outsourced to smaller companies. The boot is on the other foot, and such companies have become much more important in the past few years.

One way round that is to have a mega-merger. A little while ago there was a mega-merger of two companies in this country called Glaxo and SmithKline, into GlaxoSmithKline—it rolls off the tongue as if it were only one company, but it was two companies once. My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) spent some time investigating that merger. We were told that the company would play a star role and that lots of new discoveries would be made, but it sounds to me as though the merger might not have produced the new products that were promised at the time by Richard Sykes and Jan Leschly when they appeared before the Science and Technology Committee.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): My hon. Friend articulates his case passionately. However, GlaxoSmithKline is supporting a new centre for biotechnology in my constituency that is to be developed over the new few years as part of the Centre for Process Innovation, so perhaps he is being slightly unfair.

Dr. Gibson: I would never be unfair to GlaxoSmithKline. It is a subtle company—there has been a merger and smaller companies have been set up within the bigger company, because it recognises that sometimes initiative and innovation take place in that context. I have researched the centres that my hon. Friend mentioned, which are called research and development centres—nothing clever about the name—and GlaxoSmithKline has quite a few, because it sees that small is beautiful. That is the way to get innovation and people working together better. The bigger the organisation, the more bureaucracy there tends to be, with innovation not receiving the support that it needs.

Nowadays people tend to be loyal to the technology rather than to the company. That means that small really has become beautiful—that is the name of the game for small biotech companies. However, big pharma companies, with their experience, have something going for them. They are dominant in the development of clinical trials, they chaperone the smaller companies over the regulatory hurdles that they face and they help them to market their products, so mutually beneficial interaction is taking place. We need to examine how that is happening and to encourage it.

Many applications from biotech companies are going through fast in the United States—much more than from the big pharma companies. For all its benefits, big pharma faces the problem of losing its patents after 10 years. The replacement drugs are down to a trickle, because the research has not been developed fast enough. Big pharma is still cash rich from its drugs sales, while the US Job Creation Act 2004 gives it billions of dollars in tax breaks if it repatriates any earnings for the companies that invest in the USA.

Big, manic mergers are taking place. Pfizer has taken over Vicuron, for example. Therapeutic companies are being bought up by even smaller companies, such as Amgen, about which many hon. Members will have been lobbied. It is a biotechnology company based in Los Angeles that has taken over a smaller biotech company and thus become a middle-sized company. Companies do not have to be producing anything for such takeovers. Development can be part of the reason for the merger.

Big sums of money are involved in such takeovers, because people see the possibilities. For example, Novartis paid $5.5 billion for Gilead, a San Francisco company that makes Tenofovir, which is used to treat HIV, and Tamiflu, which is used for influenza and which has since been licensed to Roche. The interactions in the market do not follow the typical pattern, however. There are many failures, and many small biotech companies remain just that, in the Coca-Cola league rather than the premier league. However, they must not give up, because who knows what they might discover with the creativity of the people working for them.

It is not fair to compare the UK with the US. We are second in terms of biotechnology production and the amount invested. Much less money is invested in British companies. There are fewer clusters—I mentioned Norwich as an example of where there ought to be one, but there are many other examples where we have been trying for years to get that to happen, but it has not. We hold up Cambridge and Oxford as the star examples—I will not go into the details of how that happened, but it had less to do with Government intervention and more to do with Adnams ale and people meeting in a pub, becoming familiar and deciding to work together. If that is the way developments happen, we should promote it. We should ensure that the right people are together where they have their coffee or pint of Adnams, talking about developing this illustrious field.

If the goal is to develop new leading drugs, collaboration with a range of partners will be essential. Things will need to be set up so that innovation becomes the name of the game. Creative people can usually find each other—something that the Department of Trade and Industry ought to realise—and they do not need the airfare to LA or San Francisco. They will know that someone else is doing work in which they are interested, and they will get there to work with them. Once they get together and start the ball rolling, we must ensure that they are supported at the various stages.

Dr. Kumar: Does my hon. Friend not agree that in order for the climate that he articulates to be created, the organisational cluster needs to be in the ideal place to make it happen, and that we need to bring the universities, industry and the entrepreneurs together to ensure a successful future for the biotechnology industry?

Dr. Gibson: I thank my hon. Friend. In theory, that is what should happen, but I question whether it happens quickly enough and whether we have learned all that we need to learn. Simply talking together over coffee is not enough. Those who want to set up a business will need a lot of help, and I shall deal in a minute with tax credits and other methods of support.

The industry has not matured yet. It has quite a long way to go. For instance, we need to improve the financial environment for UK biosciences. Globally, we are second only to the USA, but we need a supportive funding environment to make it happen. In 2005, Paul Myners reported to the Government on pre-emption rights. What he said in the report summarises how small biotech companies work. He stated:

> "Such companies quickly outgrow the capacity of private investors to service their cash needs but have few physical assets to offer as collateral to banks and no credit ratings to access bond markets. They therefore have to come to the public markets to broaden their capital base but represent high risk investments, heavily dependent on equity injections but offering the potential for high returns to shareholders if their promise is fulfilled."

We have to be ambitious and want that to happen.

We need a cross-party understanding of the problems, and we must work together to make it happen. We also need research and development tax credits to remove restrictions on collecting money in order to develop the business from stage A to stages B, C and D in order to get the product on the market. We have to change that threshold. In the last Budget, the Chancellor recommended that companies with 500 or fewer staff should receive some support. That is a start, but the world is moving fast in this field, and we have to help.

Another problem that we have to face is the inability of the bioscience sector to take up new medicines in the UK as fast as elsewhere. A major pan-European report on access to cancer drugs published in October 2005 by the Karolinska institute suggested that the UK lagged behind in terms of access to cancer drugs. It is generally agreed that our processes and structures do not allow new products on to the market fast enough. We need to fast-track more innovative medicines, with funding to increase their uptake by the NHS. We have all seen the sorry sight of Herceptin not being provided for all in the UK who need it. I hope that the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence is listening. I am looking for some radical changes in the organisation's operations.

I turn to the question of animal extremism. Animal testing is needed to ensure the safety of drugs before they are used by people. That might be ironic given the six recent cases in London, but that does not deflect from the need for animal experiments as a preamble to the use of drugs in human beings.

We all know about the campaigns against Huntingdon Life Sciences. We all know that the groups that take such action are not huge: a few determined people have taken the issue across the Atlantic to New York and attacked shareholders in those companies that carry out animal experiments. They write letters, sound klaxon horns outside houses, use incendiary bombs and throw bricks through windows. That has decreased since Home Office Ministers made efforts to illegalise the processes under the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, but there are still cases of damage to private property.

People have a right to protest peacefully, and I am absolutely in favour of people marching if they think that animal experiments should be limited or completely stopped—a good argument can be made for that—but I deprecate the activities of the small group of people who carry out what could be called terrorist acts. That may be an extreme description, but that is how it seems to those who work in that industry and who are dedicated to producing drugs to improve peoples' lives.

Ironically—I hope that they hear this—some of those extremists must use drugs to cure their own problems. I am sure that aspirin has been useful to them, because they too must hear the noise of the klaxons when they sound them. I have every sympathy for them, and if they keep using the drugs that have been tested by the system, they will be okay, but they should cut it out and let us have a reasonable argument about the technologies that can be developed to test new compounds. I read that the United States is getting tough on such extremism too, and that three individuals are about to be sentenced or have just been sentenced to jail for their activities. We need more such action here, because the problem will not go away.

The Budget was good in highlighting the need for biotechnology to keep us in the world-class environment for health research and development and innovation. The Budget announced support for Sir John Pattison's stem cell initiative, of which we are a partner through the Stem Cell Foundation. Once new products are almost on the market, we hope that they will be supported in order to ensure that they are developed in this country rather than slipping to other countries for development. Funding worth £100 million has been announced—a further investment of £50 million.

I am not saying that stem cell research will cure Parkinson's or Alzheimer's, but I respect the right of clever people in this country who can do research, and who question what they are doing, to be able to carry it out peacefully. That includes finding out whether using embryonic or adult cells is the way forward for some treatments. There is a little chink of light in that area, particularly with cardiovascular diseases.

It is good that we have this industry, but we must recognise that part of the innovation process of getting a sustainable industry is training our young people in these methodologies. I know that many young people do not want to go into industry. They still live in that world where people do not want to get their hands dirty or take the filthy lucre. They would rather be GPs and take £250,000 a year, or lawyers and take £500,000. Nevertheless, those in this industry are well paid, and we should do all that we can to encourage them.

It is important that the process of training makes people feel fired up and keen to use their talents. That is why science, technology and engineering should be a major part of the curriculum for our young people. I note that, in a debate in the other place, someone said that the curriculum and the order in which things are taught has not changed for about 50 years. It can take a long time to recognise that today's world is so different from the world of those who developed the curricula. I hope that the Chancellor or whoever is developing sciences in this country—it seems to change each week—gets stuck in and helps to develop new technologies by bringing in young people.

The country needs to be steeped in science. Science and science-based innovation should be right at the top of the political agenda. We must rethink how we are to educate tomorrow's scientists, and involve the public in the debate, not make them feel anti-science. We should make them feel that it is useful, and not let them be thrown by silly arguments about GM or by what extremists say about animal experiments.

The Treasury is beginning to rethink the whole policy structure—from the last Budget, at least—including how science will be funded; having new research institutes and combining them; and how computer science, which develops almost daily with new ideas and model systems, should be used. Public-private partnerships need to be developed in a way that encourages innovation. We all talk about industry interacting with universities and higher education. Gosh, I have heard about that for almost a hundred years, but we have not found a way to make it work. Last night at a reception, I happened to meet some people who run small businesses, who said that universities do not understand how business works—but universities say that they do not like how business works, so we cannot blame either side. We must try to bang their heads together to make them work together. I do not mean that they should simply form small companies that offer advisory services: they should form companies that take basic, primaeval, blue skies discoveries and develop them into products.

It is time for us to stop simply paying lip service to all this. If we really believe in the future of biotechnology, which is a rosy and growing field, we have to back it up with good, solid training at all levels. The blame is not all on one side as far as universities and industry are concerned. It is time to cut the cackle and set up structures to make it really happen in this country.

There is no reason why we could not be No. 1 if we really wanted to be. We could produce double the number of companies that we are now producing. Every day—or every week, who knows?—someone makes a discovery that, if the right person saw it, could be exploited into something useful to make our lives better. It happens to be drugs at the moment. I think that the use of drugs in this country will increase as we better understand the molecular processes behind diseases and how we can handle them. That will be a growing area. Currently, we do not have the right structures to handle things at the rate at which they are coming on board. There is a bright future, but lots to do.

11.32 am

Willie Rennie (Dunfermline and West Fife) (LD): The UK bioindustry is one of the best examples in Europe of the exploitation of science ideas. The biotechnology industry is recognised as being one of the most advanced in the world, but it is vital that it should be recognised and maintained to sustain our lead in that field. Securing investment should encourage innovation and ensure that the UK economy will benefit as a result.

[Willie Rennie]

Britain's entrepreneurial bioscience sector is a leader in Europe, accounting for 27 per cent. of all entrepreneurial bioscience companies in Europe. The UK also accounts for 93 per cent. of all publicly quoted bioscience companies in Europe, and has a combined market capitalisation of £5 billion. The industry is one of the fastest growing in the UK, with employment expanding at over 20 per cent. annually. Three quarters of biotechnology drugs in late-stage clinical trials in Europe are produced by British companies. Giants of British biotechnology, such as Celltech, dominate the continent. It is vital that investment and careful regulation should allow us to maintain our lead in this area.

Biotechnology is recognised as being part of the next wave of the knowledge economy. The market in Europe alone was expected to be worth more than $100 billion by 2005. More than 40,000 people are employed in the biotechnology industry, mostly in highly skilled jobs—the sort of jobs that we need for the developing UK economy. The bioindustry has the potential to provide employment for millions of people in the UK, making it one of the most important emerging markets for our generation.

I pay tribute to the Government's efforts, because they have made significant efforts on the science agenda, but, more importantly, I pay tribute to bioindustry leaders. They have gone through many difficult times to make the industry successful. Before the Government get too excited by my praise, I shall point out that the level of research and development in the UK is poor. We all recognise that. Compared with Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and European countries, we are well below the average for R and D. Pharmaceuticals and aerospace are the only exceptions in which we are doing well. Thankfully, however, the bioindustry is starting to pull things together.

There should be more effort to improve investment in R and D. The Government have made some progress in this area with R and D tax credits and the extension that the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) mentioned, and with the framework for science and innovation, which is also great progress. There is also progress with Bioscience 2015, which has led to two world-class bioprocessing centres, including one in Edinburgh, and the single budget for medical research of more than £1 billion a year. My Liberal Democrat colleagues and I want to ensure that none of that is just smoke and mirrors. Many expectations were raised through the science and innovation framework, but much of it has not yet been delivered. We need to ensure that it is delivered.

Some areas require further success. The science base in this country does well internationally. We produce many papers and do well in academic journals, but we need to do more to turn those ideas into businesses. That is where much of the transition work is required. With education, we often hear about the number of pupils taking up science, but there are great concerns on both sides of the border that not enough are taking up chemistry, biology and physics. If we are to sustain our economic success, we need pupils to come through the system.

There also needs to be attitudinal change, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. Many academics who I come across do not believe that it is for them to get involved in business. We need to change that and encourage them to make that transition and identify ideas that could be business opportunities.

Among public opinion, there is great concern about terrorists. As we progress with biotech advances, we should take the public with us so that they are not concerned about that progress.

I am greatly concerned that the financial pressures placed on universities mean that they often try to squeeze every last penny out of intellectual property. There needs to be a freer system in which they are encouraged to let IP go on in a more cost-effective way, so that we can encourage businesses to form clusters around universities rather than there being a squeeze for every last penny that IP is worth.

I turn to the situation north of the border, and my colleagues in the Scottish Executive, and encourage the Government to consider how the Executive are handling the progress of science there. Bringing together enterprise and higher education in one Department has meant that lessons have been learned on both sides of that divide about how to connect and address issues such as attitudinal change of academics. The Government should look at how the Scottish Executive is handling that.

The Scottish Higher Education Funding Council, which is now the Scottish Funding Council, works closely with Scottish Enterprise to provide joint funds on the proof of concept and in other areas to ensure that we have seamless government encouraging many scientists to create businesses. A new initiative that is helping to sustain many science departments in Scotland is pooling arrangements, whereby chemistry and physics departments are pooled. I know that people in many other disciplines are considering how they can work together to get the critical mass that is required to compete on the international stage. I hope that the Government will consider the efforts that are being made in Scotland to advance the cause of science.

It is right to recognise that progress has been made on the science agenda, but there is much more work to do in education and on ensuring that there is attitudinal change. It is also important to address the issue of public opinion. Finally, I hope that the Government will consider the efforts north of the border to make that advance.

11.40 am

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing the debate. He is a great and passionate advocate of science. For all the years that I have been on the Science and Technology Committee with him, as well as the different occasions when we have been colleagues, he has passionately championed science and technology. As Chairman of the Committee in the past, he has put science at the top of the political agenda. Everyone can recognise how passionately he articulated the case for biotechnology.

Only yesterday, I was saying to my hon. Friend that I would come in to the debate for a few minutes and maybe take part for a short while. I enjoyed his speech and I started out feeling highly optimistic, but halfway through a sort of gloom took over me. He said that everything was going in the wrong direction and we have not done enough. By the end, however, he had convinced me that the Government have made a great deal of progress and that we need to do a lot more. Overall, I can at least share that spirit with him.

My hon. Friend talked about trying to enthuse young people so that they take science and technology seriously. I agree. Some of the things that are going wrong at our universities, with chemistry and physics departments being closed, are certainly worrying. We need to enthuse our young people to go into science and technology so that we create entrepreneurs and a biotechnology industry and make it a great success.

My hon. Friend talked about the international and national perspective, and then went on to talk about Norwich. However, I want to talk about what the Government have done and how that has affected my area. I am proud of the Government, as they have done more to support science and technology than any previous Government in my lifetime. The science and technology budget has doubled since 1997. That is due to a step-by-step approach to ensure that we target the money in every sector, tackle problems for the long term and build a strong scientific base. That is to be commended. The Government have a tremendous record. I remember that pre-1997, science budgets were cut. Nowadays, they are increasing. It is a tremendous credit to the Government that that has happened.

I want also to acknowledge the influence of Government policy in the north-east and Tees valley. I want to talk about how biotechnology has affected the area and to say one or two things about where we will go from here, as well as some of the problems that I see. If we are to make progress—we have already achieved a great deal—I want the Minister to think about how we will deal with the problems, particularly in my area, because we should be thinking in the long term. I have talked to people in my area and they wanted me to pass on these matters to the Minister. I know that he cares passionately about the north-east.

In the north-east, 45 companies have biotechnology interests, with 3,832 employees and a turnover of £634 million. In addition, 23 of the companies actively engage in research and development and see that as a key business activity. The companies support 47 academic research projects, although 60 per cent. of those involve universities outside the north-east. I would love to see such activity within the north-east, but at the moment it is outside.

In Tees valley, the smaller chemical companies are working closely with larger chemical producers, and they are interacting with the Wilton research centre, which is one of the best European centres for research and development in the chemical industry. The chemical process industry, which is vital to the economy of the Tees valley and the north-east, provides direct employment for 12,000 people and indirectly employs 65,000 across the UK. Of course, the biotechnology industry and the Tees valley have tremendous opportunities.

As I mentioned in my intervention earlier, one of the great success stories has been the Centre for Process Innovation, which is part of the Wilton research centre. Recently, it was announced that a national industrial biotechnology centre would be built. That was tremendous news for us, to be the first in the north-east to lead with the centre for biotechnology. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North mentioned the regional development agencies. Our RDA, One NorthEast, is certainly at the forefront and working in collaboration with GlaxoSmithKline to try to support the centre. I can see that offshoot of the research centre offering an opportunity to those who want to engage in research, develop new processes and try new products. They will certainly benefit.

I am delighted that the centre, which will be only a few miles from my constituency, will benefit the whole area. We are delighted and grateful for the support that the centre has received from the Government. In years to come, there will be many offshoots in the north-east, in the spirit articulated by my hon. Friend. A study conducted by the north-east process industry cluster predicted a 32 per cent. rise in employment over five years for existing north-east companies, certainly in the biotechnology sector. It predicted that some 1,200 new, high-skilled jobs could be created.

There is great concern about the skills requirement for our area. If we are to have a competent, successful biotechnology industry, we need to plan ahead. In the Tees valley and the north-east the issue has been raised over and over again that we need technicians. The Minister should discuss that with his colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills. We need biotechnicians, not graduates or advanced graduates—we have them, as my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North mentioned. Clever people—those with PhDs, research fellows and academics of a higher calibre—are not a problem. However, at technician level we are facing great difficulties. If we are to have a successful biotechnology industry, we need degree-level biotechnicians, and to deal with that we will need some sort of advanced modern apprenticeship.

Given that the centre will be ready in a few years' time and that there will be other offshoots of companies, there will be a massive haemorrhage of technicians at the required level. If we do not have the skills, what are we going to do? Will we start looking abroad? We need to plan ahead, and that is the view of the north-east process industry cluster and of One NorthEast. The Minister would find it useful to consult them.

Once the biotechnology industry makes further progress, will the Minister consider having the universities collaborate more strongly together and with the biotechnology industry? There is some collaboration at present, but as we hope to make progress there is room for further interaction between the universities.

In my area, we have a successful chemical industry and a successful research and development centre. The offshoot of that is that we now have an emerging biotechnology centre. There are great opportunities in respect of some of the ideas that my hon. Friend talked about, but it is essential that everything happens in parallel—such as the research work that needs to be carried out, and for which we have the skilled work force—in order for us to have the outcome of a successful economy.

The Government have given a lot of support—in my area, certainly. We have made much progress, but we need to plan ahead. Although I have one or two concerns, I commend the Government's efforts and the support that they have given to the chemical and pharmaceutical industries, along with—we hope, for the future—to the biotechnology industry.

We have a first-class Minister for Science and Innovation in Lord Sainsbury. He has visited my constituency and neighbouring areas on several occasions. I objected to his appointment, but he has proved to be an outstanding Science Minister. Over the years I have championed him because he has shown tremendous foresight and vision. I hope that the Minister will convey to him that I think he is doing a grand job. However, I also ask the Minister to take on board the points that I have made.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) for securing this debate; it addresses an important issue. I also thank the other Members who have made valuable contributions to it.

Biotechnology is potentially one of the most exciting areas of wealth generation for our country for the foreseeable future. Although the people of the United Kingdom constitute 1 per cent. of the world population, we are responsible for 5 per cent. of the world's science and 12 per cent. of its scientific citations, and we are the second largest biotechnology country—behind only the United States of America. Biotechnology is also one of the fastest growing industries in the UK; growth is 16 to 17 per cent. compared with 7 to 8 per cent. in the pharmaceutical industry generally. As the pharmaceutical industries are certainly no slouches, that gives us an understanding of how fast the biotechnology industry is moving. There are 455 dedicated biotechnology businesses, and more than 22,000 people are employed in the industry.

It is an important area, but, in respect of many aspects of global competitiveness, the UK is suffering in comparison with countries such as China and India, which are developing fast on our heels. China has plans to increase its investment in biotechnology threefold in the next five years, and the increase for India will be fivefold. Therefore, we must move quickly. This industry must be supported properly by the Government.

Members have spoken about their local areas. In the west midlands only last week, 2,300 redundancies were announced as a result of the Peugeot factory closure. It is clear that areas such as Coventry need to reinvent themselves in respect of high value-added areas of industry in order to be able to avoid suffering the problems of mass redundancies and the misery that that generates. Marine biotechnology is a particularly fast-growing field in Coventry. I am looking forward to there being assistance through Government agencies for the development of the infrastructure to enable biotechnology to be developed in the west midlands.

I shall now speak briefly about the role of the Government. We want the industry to be as free as possible to develop itself, but there are issues that the Government cannot avoid some involvement in. The hon. Member for Norwich, North talked about Government investment, and my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie) mentioned research and development tax credits. The bioscience for business knowledge transfer network was announced this year, which will promote industries working together. We are looking forward to hearing how that develops. There will be some small additional investment in that as well from the Government.

The need for skills has also been mentioned. In the UK, it seems that science has been a poor relation in many academic circles, but there are some superb centres of excellence in our universities, which have been referred to. We need to convey the excitement of the challenge that biotechnology and related sciences present for the future of the country. Only in that way will we generate the necessary enthusiasm among young people for them to want to commit to a career in these fields. I also take on board the point of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) regarding biotechnicians; in that area, we need plenty of Indians, as well as chiefs.

With regard to the regulatory pathways, there has been some press criticism about the slowness of the food and drinks administration. That has held up our competitive advantage, particularly with the United States, which seems to get its act together a little more quickly in respect of regulatory pathways. Its pathways are, perhaps, a little smoother than ours in the United Kingdom.

One cannot talk about biotechnology without acknowledging that there are huge ethical issues that need to be addressed, such as stem cell research. We are hopeful that the solution to terrible afflictions such as Alzheimer's, Parkinson's and kidney failure can be found from stem cell research. There is also the controversy over the non-prescription of the Herceptin cancer drug. Anyone who has cancer and is in pain will appreciate the fundamental importance of the availability of potential life-saving treatments in those areas. I echo the comments of the hon. Member for Norwich, North about the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, and its slowness sometimes in respect of being able to promote faster relief for people by the way that it operates and regulates the introduction of new drugs. There are also the issues of the potential for terrorist attacks, and the safety of the people who produce the various products.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to animal testing. Although that is clearly an emotive and difficult issue, the Government cannot duck their responsibility in respect of such areas to consider the ethical views of all members of the population. Sadly, we saw the result of faulty testing on people only the other week, when monoclonal antibody tests were done that wreaked havoc in the six volunteers.

The final ethical issues that I want to raise relate to GM. People in this country have been much less accepting of that particular technology than those elsewhere. There are also big concerns about terminator technologies and the ethical effects that they will have for small businesses and farms in poorer, less developed countries. The Government have an interesting furrow to plough in the field of technology. I echo the comments of the Labour Members who have spoken and of my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline and West Fife: we in this country need to facilitate the development of what is potentially the most exciting area of industrial development. That will keep us ahead of the game and will ensure that we keep a higher value added industry that we need if we are to compete in a world with many challenges.

12.1 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I sincerely congratulate the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) on securing the debate and giving us an opportunity to examine and debate this very important subject, which is so often forgotten. That is partly because if one mentioned that we were to have a debate on biotechnology to anyone walking the corridors, the most common reaction would be, "What is biotechnology?" but in fact it is a science that permeates just about every area of life, including business and the economy. The hon. Gentleman highlighted all those points extremely well. It is a worthwhile exercise to bring the subject to the House to highlight what has to be done and how we ought to perceive this important industry.

I am particularly pleased to support the hon. Gentleman because he and I are exclusive members of a very unusual all-party group, namely the all-party St. Mirren supporters group. For the uninitiated, St. Mirren is the football club of Paisley and has, after many years, just been promoted to the premier league. We are not an official all-party group because there are not enough of us to create one. The subject might not appear entirely relevant, but it is, because it shows that the hon. Gentleman is prepared to go out on a limb on subjects to which other people are not paying attention. He is a trailblazer in bringing to our notice matters that ought to be dealt with but often are not, such as the success of St. Mirren and the biotechnology industry.

Normally, my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) responds for the Opposition on debates of this kind, but unfortunately he has other duties this morning. It gives me great pleasure to stand in for him.

Why does biotechnology matter? Several hon. Members have explained that very well. It matters enormously, first because the UK is a world leader, being second only to the United States in the development of bioscience. If we analyse the industries involved, that is not at all surprising. Innovation often begins in the UK, where we have the academic and business climate to let it begin to grow, but when it flourishes, too often our regulatory or economic regimes force companies abroad. That is not happening in biotechnology, and I hope that by highlighting the subject and allowing the Minister to address it—at some length, I hope, for which reason I shall be brief—we can make progress in supporting the industry.

It is not generally recognised—although the hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) mentioned it—that 22,500 people are employed in biotechnology industries in the UK. The effect on the alternative investment market is significant. In 2005, the AIM—sometimes described as London's junior stock exchange, because the general public do not understand what AIM is—became the de facto global market for small bioscience companies, so biotechnology is important in not only industry and the academic world but the City, too. The fact that AIM is attracting listings from not only the UK but the US, continental Europe and beyond is important in bringing investment and wealth into the City of London.

I have a few questions for the Minister, one of which regards the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. Sometimes, because of the way in which cross-product price modulation is set up, there can be a problem for smaller companies. As the hon. Member for Norwich, North, rightly said, it is, after all, in smaller companies that innovation occurs. They are the seedbeds of biotechnology growth. However, the way in which the PPRS is constructed can sometimes cause problems, because smaller companies typically launch only one or two products, rather than a range of products, and so cannot take advantage of cross-product price modulation in the way that larger companies can, so they do not benefit from the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. I appreciate that that is a subject that the Minister may have to consider, but it is worthy of consideration, because it would be a great pity if, inadvertently, smaller companies were put at a competitive disadvantage compared with larger companies, when it is those smaller companies that we desperately need to encourage.

We all know, from the excellent speeches this morning and from general coverage of such issues, just how important the development of bioscience and biotechnology are to the provision of antibiotics, vaccines and other drugs that are so important in health policy and in developing a better health service. However, the issue goes wider than that. It applies to international development issues such as the eradication of hunger caused by failed crops, for example. One of the solutions to that problem—and I do not mean to make it sound simple—is the development of biotechnology to improve crops. Likewise, we have enormous problems with energy supply and its security, and effects on the environment. Again, it is research currently being undertaken by small biotechnology companies and by the academic sector that will provide some of the solutions to problems to do with energy and the environment. Biofuels certainly represent an important avenue for reducing our dependence on oil and thus improving the quality of our environment. We have an opportunity here to bring that much ignored and misunderstood fact to general attention.

As has been said, it is unfortunate that the media in general often talk about the development of bioscience because of the illegal extremist activities of some who purport to care about animal welfare. Surely there is a way to balance the animal welfare that we all want to see with the need to test drugs. The UK is a world leader on the issue. Is it not better that testing on animals should occur under strictly regulated conditions in Britain? Companies would otherwise be driven away and test in less regulated conditions, which could be very harmful to the animals.

It is a pity that the criminal extremists who have waged campaigns against companies such as Huntingdon Life Sciences have been the conduit through which the subject of bioscience has been brought to general recognition. That is unfortunate because there is so much that is positive to say about it.

What can we as a legislative body do to help nurture and enhance the biotechnology industry? I do not like to ask what the Government can do, because I do not believe that they should drive development and so on. However, it is the Government's role, on behalf of us all, to provide the necessary conditions in which this vital sector can flourish. I echo the words of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar), who talked about the importance of encouraging the study of science, not just among students at university but among technologically educated and qualified people at not only graduate but other levels.

Such people are vital. At present, 22,500 people are employed in the sector, and I hope that the number will increase markedly during the next decade. It will not do so if the education system does not produce enough people properly educated in the right basic subjects. The challenge for the Government is to ensure that we have not only enough graduates but enough apprentices.

The second challenge—the clash between public and private sector operations—has been identified by the CBI as a problem. I identify a parallel clash between the business and academic worlds; in the biotechnology sector almost more than in any other, it is vital that the public sector works with the private sector and that business works with the academic sector, but at present there is a lack of cohesion and understanding. I do not suggest—far from it—that the Government could put that right with a legislative programme, but if the Minister assured us that he was aware of the problem, that would be a step in the right direction. I ask not for Government intervention but that the Government ensure that the economic and regulatory regime within which the biotechnology industries, so precious to our future economy, operate, is the right one, and that there are conditions for research and development to grow, to allow this vital sector of our industry to flourish.

I conclude on that point, because I wish to ensure that the Minister has plenty of time to answer the important questions asked this morning.

12.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): It is always a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Cummings. We have had a super debate. I always look forward to debates secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson). We always touch on Norwich City football team—that is an inevitable part of proceedings—but to get on to St. Mirren was quite remarkable. Here am I, an old Queen's Park supporter—my team still languishes in the Scottish second division, but we too have hopes and aspirations.

I ask you to forgive my rather croaky voice this morning, Mr. Cummings. I am sure that when I tell hon. Members that my eight-year-old's football team won the league cup on Sunday morning, they will appreciate why. I know that my hon. Friend, also, will forgive me for sounding rather more peculiar than usual.

Although there is debate on the exact timing of the birth of the bioscience industry, it is generally accepted that it started with the founding of Genentech in the US in 1976. Since then, the industry has grown from a lone start-up to a sector that generates revenues of $63 billion globally. That is phenomenal growth by anyone's standards.

The industry is still dominated by the US, and the relatively younger companies in Europe and Asia have significant challenges as they try to catch up. However, the UK's biotechnology sector is the largest in Europe—globally, as has been said, it is second only to the US—so we have an excellent platform on which to build our strategic support for the sector.

Let me rehearse some of the basic facts, some of which have been mentioned. Biotechnology is recognised as the next wave of the knowledge economy. It represents one of the fastest-growing industries in the UK. Some 40 per cent. of all European public biotechnology companies are based here, and 43 per cent. of the biotechnology drugs in late-stage clinical trials in Europe are produced by British companies. Global sales of biotech drugs grew by 17 per cent. in 2005, giving sales of $53 billion. The sale of all pharma drugs grew by only 7 per cent., so the growth in sales of biotech drugs is astonishing.

There are approximately 455 dedicated bioscience companies in the UK, employing almost 22,500 people, and in 2003 they generated revenues of approximately £3.6 billion and spent £1.23 billion on research and development. The biotech industry has the potential to provide employment for millions of people in the European Union, making it one of the most important emerging sectors of our generation.

However, in this context it is also important to mention the pharmaceutical industry, a dynamic performer of key importance to the UK economy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) said in relation to his constituency, it has helped the growth of the smaller bioscience companies and is increasingly benefiting from closer collaboration with them.

The pharma sector has an outstanding record of innovation, having discovered and developed a quarter of the world's top 100 medicines. Among the G7 economies, the productivity of drug discovery in the UK is second only to that of the US. The UK is home to two of the world's largest pharma companies, GSK and AstraZeneca, and all the leading global pharma companies have significant manufacturing and/or research and development facilities in the UK. They invest more than any other sector in R and D in the UK. The industry accounts for 0.6 per cent. of the UK's gross domestic product and generates the UK's biggest trade surplus.

The hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) said that the UK was not at the top of the European and global league for research and development, but she should realise that in the pharma and bioscience sectors, we are. The percentage of our GDP going into R and D is not at the top of the European league, but we are right at the top and the cutting edge of R and D in the pharma and bioscience sectors. Indeed, companies such as GSK and AstraZeneca make up more than 40 per cent. of the total UK spend on R and D in the private sector.

The UK is one of the world's largest exporters of pharmaceuticals by value. In 2005, exports and the trade surplus totalled £12.2 billion and £3.4 billion respectively. The sector employs 73,000 people across all business segments, approximately 27,000 of whom are engaged in research and development activities. It also generates another 250,000 jobs in related industries.

Given the sector's enormous contribution to innovation, it is an essential partner in achieving the Government's targets under the 10-year science and innovation investment framework.

The bioscience and pharmaceutical industries are closely related and are interdependent. Many of the factors that make the UK a good environment for those industries are common to both: a strong science base; highly-skilled staff; sound regulation; and close dialogue with Government. Just as big pharma increasingly looks to biotech companies to fill gaps in its product pipeline, so they rely on licensing revenues to finance their activities and on the developing and marketing expertise of big pharma to bring their discoveries to market.

Dr. Gibson: Can the Minister explain why small biotech companies in the States, of which there were many—Gilead and so on—have become, in a sense, big companies without a merger? Why has that not happened in Britain?

Barry Gardiner: The short answer is no, I cannot do so off the top of my head. My hon. Friend raises an interesting question. I would take some time to establish a thesis as to why that has taken place, so I shall speak to my officials in the Department and write to him to develop our answer a wee bit further. There is an interesting difference between the two markets. I suspect—this is off the top of my head—that it has something to do with the more advanced venture capital structure of the US compared with ours in the UK.

A key role of the Department of Trade and Industry is to ensure that the voice of business is heard across Whitehall, that Departments take account of business needs in framing their policies, and that successful businesses are encouraged to grow in an increasingly competitive environment. We need, therefore, to be constantly in touch with industry. There has been a long history of collaboration between Government and industry.

I was particularly grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland for the way in which he spoke about my colleague Lord Sainsbury. He was right that Lord Sainsbury has been an exceptional Minister for Science and Innovation. In 2002, he and other Ministers met representatives from the BioIndustry Association, the UK's trade body for biotechnology. It was agreed that the time had come to take a more detailed look at some of the major issues affecting the sector.

As a result of Lord Sainsbury's initiative, the Government decided to set up the bioscience innovation and growth team, chaired by Sir David Cooksey. Its task was to identify any barriers that could significantly hold back the sector's growth in the UK and to make recommendations about how those obstacles could be overcome. Although it has formally finished, a great deal of joint industry-Government activity is continuing. Ministers still have regular contact with industry. That will lead to a mid-term review of the BIGT by 2007–08. Undoubtedly, the taskforce recommendations have helped to influence the shape of Government policy today. As a result, there have been many improvements in the areas of finance and investment, bioprocessing, the European market, and national health service-industry partnerships.

Dr. Gibson: Does the Minister concede that the idea of a science city will precipitate the development of small businesses, as it has in the six existing science cities? Will that be part of his remit, which he mentioned in terms of biotech innovation and development? Does he think that the science city concept will make such development occur better?

Barry Gardiner: My hon. Friend is pushing me for a clear commitment. I am unsure whether I would like to give him such a commitment. However, as he mentioned, anything that enables people to come together—whether that be around a pint of Adnams ale or whether we are talking about a science city concept—to work together and to develop innovative patterns of research and development and then push those through into products must be welcomed.

On finance, I am pleased with the outcome of the work that Paul Myners led on behalf of the Government to examine the issue of pre-emption rights, which, again, was raised in our debate. There is support for the greater flexibility of their application, which he recommended. Scott Dobie's reformed pre-emption group has been engaging industry and investors to agree new guidelines that will be published shortly. The next stage will be to monitor how they work in practice, but I am pleased with results so far from the constructive engagement of industry and investors. There has also been much dialogue with industry on research and development tax credits and their role in encouraging businesses to invest more in research and development.

On NHS-industry partnerships, the UK clinical research collaboration has been established. It is a partnership of Government, research organisations, NHS trusts and industry, united by the shared aim of establishing the UK's position as a world leader in clinical research by harnessing the power of the NHS.

EU better regulation was a priority for the UK presidency, and the Department of Trade and Industry is at the forefront of the Government's drive to improve the EU regulatory environment in this area.

I come to the central issue of skills, which was raised by several hon. Members. In November, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry published a report entitled "Sustaining the Skills Pipeline in the pharmaceutical and biopharmaceutical industries", which set out concerns about the supply of suitably qualified graduates and technicians, and in particular the decline of in vivo practical skills. The report is excellent. Lord Sainsbury and Sir David King have responded by supporting some of the key recommendations, and the DTI is working with the ABPI to set up an in vivo taskforce.

We are also sympathetic to the view that there should be a science diploma for 14 to 19-year-olds. Again, that picks up on the themes of co-operation and joined-up thinking between the DTI and the Department for Education and Skills mentioned by hon. Members. The Government are determined that through that collaborative approach they will play their full part in ensuring that the pharmaceutical and biotechnology industries have a steady supply of the qualified graduates and technicians that they need.

[Barry Gardiner]

Partly because it has been topical, partly because hon. Members have raised the issue, and partly because I wanted to give the hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) the opportunity perhaps to correct a misapprehension that she may have shown in her remarks, I want to discuss the issue of the testing at Northwick Park. She said that there was "faulty testing". I want to scotch such an idea, because it is clear that, to date, the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency has found no evidence to suggest that there was any problem with the manufacture of the new monoclonal antibody TGN 1412, nor did the MHRA find any problems with the administration of the clinical trial which are likely to have contributed to the serious adverse incidents that took place at Northwick Park.

The MHRA is still carrying out further tests to confirm those findings, but if they are confirmed, it would appear that there was something peculiar about the product and its mode of operation in human beings which led to the adverse incidents. That was not predicted in the pre-clinical research carried out on the drug, including the animal tests. I want to give the hon. Lady the opportunity to correct the record, if she so chooses.

Lorely Burt: I am grateful to the Minister for that further elucidation. I thank him for taking the trouble to explain things.

Barry Gardiner: We obviously have to work out how best to assess new types of drugs. The Government have therefore agreed to establish a group of leading international experts in the field to consider the risks associated with this new type of drug and how to make the transition from pre-clinical testing to trials in humans. Members are to be appointed from distinguished experts in the relevant fields of inquiry, including immunology, toxicology and clinical trialling.

Encouraging innovation and demand for new technologies is essential to ensuring that UK business remains competitive in the tough global marketplace. The technology strategy board is developing a national technology strategy to take a more strategic approach to Government support for new and emerging technologies. The TSB's first annual report sets out its views on strategy development and plans for future competitions. The collaborative research and development competitions have featured key technologies that have wide and pervasive applications in business, and the potential to achieve significant environmental and social benefits. A total of £370 million of DTI and Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs funding is available from 2005 to 2008.

Before I conclude, I should like to pick up on the question about the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme put by the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing). That is the pricing agreement for the supply of drugs to the NHS—

John Cummings (in the Chair): Order. We must move to the next debate.

Environmentally Sustainable Housing Developments

12.30 pm

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Cummings, for allowing me to introduce this extremely important, albeit short, debate. As hon. Members from throughout the country but particularly from southern England will be aware, the Government propose to build many hundreds of thousands of extra new homes in the coming years. There is a strong need for some additional development. The Somerset County Gazette, a newspaper widely read in my constituency, had as its front-page splash last Thursday a feature on house prices in Taunton. It makes quite staggering reading. In 1995, the average house in Taunton cost £59,784; by 2005, a decade later, the price of the average house in Taunton had risen to £191,811—an increase of 320 per cent.

The ratio of average earnings to average house prices has made things very difficult for people in my constituency. Indeed, that scenario will be familiar to most, if not all, hon. Members. It is difficult for my constituents to afford to buy a property, so I am in no doubt about the need for extra development. People come to my surgery and say that they cannot find suitable social housing. People also say that they aspire to being first-time house buyers, but that not enough stock is available.

My concern, though, and the subject of this debate is not the numbers of new houses, which we have debated many times in the House, but the quality of those houses and how we go about providing for new communities in the future. I shall touch on three aspects of that issue. The first is best illustrated by an example. There is a community, a collection of houses, about four or five miles from Taunton, although it is still in my constituency. The community is in an area called Cotford St. Luke. Previously, Cotford St. Luke had only a handful of houses, but the local authority decided that it would provide additional accommodation by dramatically expanding Cotford St. Luke and allowing developers to build hundreds of new houses. I think that there are now about 1,000 houses in Cotford St. Luke.

The expansion started about six or seven years ago, but it was not until three years after it had begun that a primary school was opened in the village. By that stage, several hundred houses had been built. Many of them were lived in by first-time buyers who were attracted to the area and had children of primary school age, yet their children were going to schools in nearby villages such as Bishop's Lydeard and Oake and they were not forming a new community, even though they had moved to the village presumably with the intention of getting to know people in that area.

It was not until about a month ago that Cotford St. Luke, after many years of effort, finally had a shop. The population of Cotford St. Luke had reached about 2,000, yet it was impossible to buy a pint of milk, a pint of beer or anything else there. The only gathering point was the primary school, which, as I mentioned, opened only three years or so after the development began in earnest. Now, Cotford St. Luke has a shop, which is a breakthrough, but it still does not have a doctor's surgery, a church—at least, none has been built—or many other amenities that people would enjoy, including a pub, which is much sought after by many of the residents.

I say all that because there is a difficulty in building large estates, whether they are in areas such as Cotford St. Luke or part of existing towns, without such amenities and without many public transport routes, which is often the case. As a result, the people who live in such estates are unlikely to know and bond with their neighbours and are forced in nearly all circumstances to use a car, whether to buy a pint of milk or a pint of beer. Here we are as a Parliament and a group of politicians trying to lead a national debate about the importance of climate change and avoiding unnecessary car usage, while throughout the country new estates are being built where it is almost impossible for the inhabitants to manage in even the most basic way without a car. We and the Government need to deal with that.

The second issue that I want to turn my mind to—all the issues are related—is urban spaces and parks. Again, it is well illustrated by an example. There is an area in Taunton called Holway, and at the centre of Holway is Holway green. The council proposes, as part of its quota of houses, a new development on Holway green and that approximately two thirds of the green be concreted over and turned into new houses. The people who live in the area feel extremely strongly about that. The problem is that it deprives them of one of the few areas in their community where they can walk their dog and where their children can play football—often, they can do so within view of their house, so the parents feel that the children are safe.

I read in the newspapers that the Government estimate that about one third of children are overweight—many of them are obese—and that that is creating, in the words of one senior health professional, "a timebomb" for future generations in terms of ill health. At the same time, however, another wing of the Government is permitting green spaces in urban environments to be built on, presumably with the likelihood of a consequent reduction in physical activity by children and others in the area. I therefore support the Holway residents in their desire to see that part of Taunton retained with a green space in it. I understand why that issue is of concern to people throughout the country where councils are being urged to meet the targets on house building and are looking at places that they previously would not have considered appropriate, including parks and other green spaces in urban environments. There is a big difference between those and the brown spaces, the brownfield sites, that people often hear cited.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): I applaud the hon. Gentleman's stress on the importance of saving green space in urban environments. Is it the policy of his party and of those on its Front Bench to support the ten-minute Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) in his attempt to ensure that garden space is not continually designated as brownfield land?

Mr. Browne: I am grateful for that intervention. I cannot speak for my party on this issue; I can speak only for myself and say that I have followed the campaign of the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) closely and I understand the point that he is making. I personally would not wish to see building on gardens ruled out in all circumstances, and I suspect that quite a lot of people who own big gardens would not wish that to be ruled out in all circumstances either. However, I do not believe that the presumption should be towards building on garden spaces that are currently enjoyed by people in a different way from brownfield sites.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) mentioned the ten-minute Bill regarding garden space. I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) has supported my ten-minute Bill, which relates to the planning law in respect of gardens being designated as brownfield sites instead of green space. Additionally, with regard to his earlier point about the sale of parkland, local authorities should not be in a position to sell off valuable parkland—

John Cummings (in the Chair): Order. Interventions should be short.

Lorely Burt: I beg your pardon, Mr. Cummings. I have probably made my point.

Mr. Browne: I do not wish to sound unduly partisan on this issue. Both interventions illustrate a concern, which other hon. Members have, about preserving the natural environment and the quality of life both in our rural communities and in our towns. We accept that additional housing development is needed, but it needs to take place with the utmost sensitivity, because we are talking about a transformation being made in the communities that we represent and sometimes it appears that sufficient thought has not been given to that process.

I shall quote in my support, perhaps unusually, the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron). I had not intended to do so, but the opportunity has presented itself. He said in his current campaign for the local elections:

"Our parks and green spaces play a vital part in improving the quality of life we all enjoy—especially in urban areas, where they serve as the 'green lungs' of towns and cities."

I agree with that. My only difficulty is that it is a Conservative council in the area that I represent that wants to build on Holway green. There are difficult challenges for all of us in trying to reconcile laudable objectives with the reality on the ground.

My final point concerns the design of houses, and I can divide it into three areas as well. First, houses are built very densely. I understand why that was done, and if I were to tell a group of people, "We can halve the density, but we will take up twice the number of green fields". I suspect that they would be a great deal less enthusiastic about having less densely packed houses than they might have been. None the less, I am concerned that density appears excessive sometimes. We may be storing up social problems when we build housing estates where people literally cannot see a tree or a blade of grass because the houses built in such a tightly packed area are so oppressive and bear down on them to such an extent.

[Mr. Browne]

The second area concerns distinctive local materials. I would like people who are walking around a new housing development in Taunton to know that they are in Somerset because of the type of brick used and the style of architecture. The experience would be different from being in Warwickshire, Norfolk or any other part of the country.

Michael Gove: Once again, I am compelled to applaud the hon. Gentleman's sentiments. However, given that it is Liberal Democrat policy to put VAT on the construction of all new homes, would the additional cost mean that many new house builders, including volume house builders, would not have the space in their margins to buy and use the local materials that we would both like to see form part of new housing design and construction?

Mr. Browne: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but I fear that many developers will look to use their margins for profit, rather than to be sympathetic to the use of local building materials. There is also a wider point about whether we transport bricks hundreds of miles or use materials that are provided locally.

The third area, which may be the biggest challenge on a global scale, is this. In southern England, we are about to build hundreds of thousands of new houses. When people look back a century from now and consider whether we rose to the challenge in this coming decade, they may deem that we were not as successful as we would have liked. I am talking about features such as solar panelling, wind turbines on top of houses and improved home insulation. Many of those features are very difficult to fit to existing houses and are extremely expensive. The financial return comes over many years, if not decades. However, new houses present a new opportunity to improve environmental standards and the amount of energy that houses consume.

When we are judged by people at the turn of the next century, I hope that they look back and say, "Gosh, 95 years ago there was a boom in house building and a lot of towns changed markedly, but didn't the people at that time really use their initiative, flair and architectural imagination? They incorporated the latest techniques that really made a difference to the planet, carbon emissions and global warming. And didn't they do so in a way that was sympathetic to their environment? Far from detracting from the local architecture and character of places such as Somerset, they actually enhanced it. They were imaginative in how they allowed people to walk and how they allowed communities to form. They didn't just rely on people using their cars." I fear that when people look back at the turn of this century, they will not look as favourably on this period of development as we might wish.

Taunton has a population of about 60,000. The regional spatial strategy—a rather ugly phrase to describe housing development throughout the country—proposes a massive extension of the town, particularly concentrated in an area called Monkton Heathfield on the edge of Taunton, which would increase the size of the town by as much as 40 to 50 per cent. from its existing size during the lifetime of that programme. That will make a marked difference to our community and we must be mindful of the way in which we balance the legitimate need for extra social housing and of first time buyers to get on the housing ladder with the need to preserve the character of the town, which, after all, is what attracted people to stay there or move there in the first place. That is my challenge, in Taunton Deane, which I represent, in Exmoor and right across the country.

I finish with this observation, which the Minister may like to dwell on during his response. It is fairly straightforward to construct a collection of houses, but it is much harder to build a community. The Government, who are putting house building targets before Parliament, and local authorities throughout the country, need to be mindful of the need to build strong future communities as well as extra housing developments.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair today, Mr. Cummings. I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) on securing the debate on the important topic of environmentally sustainable housing. I pay tribute to his generosity in giving way to two other hon. Members to promote ten-minute Bills that were not his own, as well as providing them with some ammunition for local election literature during the next week or so.

I hope to reassure the hon. Gentleman that the Government are committed to protecting and enhancing the environment, to improve the quality of life of people today and to provide a more sustainable legacy for future generations, which was at the forefront of his points. New developments bring environmental pressures. However, planned strategic growth rather than incremental development should bring fewer environmental impacts because it allows for environmental pressures to be planned for, accommodated and mitigated at a strategic land site level.

The Department is working hard to use land sustainably, minimise impacts and seize the opportunity to raise the environmental performance of what we build. Draft planning policy statement 3 re-emphasises that brownfield land is the priority for development. Authorities are required to prioritise the allocation of brownfield land when they update their five-year supply.

The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) referred to the ten-minute Bill of the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark). The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has rebutted strongly the allegations that garden grabbing is going on. We do not take the accusations seriously. We are serious about brownfield development. I understand that the authors of the independent study do not accept some of the wildly inaccurate misrepresentation of their figures, although obviously these are serious matters and we do not underestimate their significance either.

Lorely Burt: I am somewhat shocked at what the Minister just said. If he were to visit my constituency of Solihull, he would see, in between the lovely old houses, groups of apartments that have been built because of the grab of people's back gardens.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I thank the hon. Lady for her intervention, but I want to concentrate on the points raised by the hon. Member for Taunton, whose debate this is. The planning policy and designations relating to gardens have not changed since 1985 and planning authorities are locally accountable to their electorates. This matter is current and the ten-minute Bill will create more interest in it in due course.

Draft PPS3 retains the requirement that regions and local planning authorities should set brownfield targets in order to contribute to achieving the national target by 2008 of at least 60 per cent. of new housing development being built on brownfield land. In 1997, only 56 per cent. of new housing was built upon brownfield sites. In 2004, 72 per cent. of new building took place on brownfield sites. We are using land more efficiently, the national target has already been exceeded, and the challenge is to sustain that.

The efficient use of land is also achieved through density policy, a point raised by the hon. Gentleman. Draft PPS3 sets out a presumption that the minimum density of housing should be no less than 30 dwellings per hectare. It promotes a more flexible approach to density, setting out indicative ranges of densities by location. Between 1997 and 2004, national average housing densities rose from 25 to 40 dwellings per hectare. The Government have also been looking more closely at how infrastructure is funded to support our growth ambitions, ensuring that we can plan and deliver our infrastructure alongside new housing.

Consultation has recently closed on a proposed planning gain supplement, which would capture a modest portion of the increase in land value that occurs when full planning permission is granted. The hon. Member for Surrey Heath has raised that issue in previous debates. A significant majority of planning gain supplement revenues would go back to the local authority area from which they were raised, to help local communities share the benefits of growth and manage its impacts. The remainder would be used to finance regional and strategic infrastructure to promote growth.

Michael Gove: Will the Minister enlighten us on what that significant proportion is? Will he tell us if and when the planning gain supplement comes in? What proportion will be spent on the local authority in which development takes place? What proportion will be spent regionally? And what proportion will the Chancellor retain to fund his black hole?

Jim Fitzpatrick: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am not in a position to answer that question today, given that the consultation has just finished. However, I am sure that he will receive that information in due course.

Under a planning gain supplement regime, section 106 agreements would be scaled back to cover affordable housing and issues directly related to the environment of the development site.

The Treasury is also leading on a cross-cutting review to ensure that Government resources are better focused on providing the necessary infrastructure to support future housing and population growth. The review will establish a framework for sustainable economic growth, and ensure that decisions about the specific locations of growth are taken in conjunction with decisions about the timely provision of the infrastructure needed to sustain them.

In addition, we recently announced that there will be a new planning policy statement on climate change. It will set out how everyone in the planning process should work towards the reduction of carbon emissions in the location and design of new developments—another important step towards achieving sustainable development.

In the Thames Gateway and the three growth areas that were announced as part of the sustainable communities plan in 2003, the ODPM is working closely with partners throughout the Government and the private and community sectors to ensure that the necessary infrastructure is available to support planned housing growth in those priority locations.

In the Thames Gateway, where an additional 120,000 dwellings are planned, significant funding has been committed, including £1.3 billion to provide transport infrastructure, £1.6 billion for skills, £1.3 billion for education and £400 million for health, to ensure that infrastructure is provided alongside housing growth. Although my constituency is urban, being London docklands, the infrastructure deficiencies of the London Docklands development corporation were very much a feature of the difficulties in east London. They are now being remedied with more investment in infrastructure, so I am familiar with those problems that the hon. Member for Taunton raised.

In our other growth areas, strategic growth plans are being developed to inform growth ambitions. For example, in Milton Keynes, the Milton Keynes Partnership is in the process of producing for the area a plan called MK 2031. It will act as a stepping stone for future statutory development plans at regional and local levels. It will include proposals for new schools, health centres, parks and open spaces, and identify future locations for housing, jobs and transport links. It will ensure that from the outset of the planning process, the needs of that expanding community are understood. That approach will strengthen the planning process and ensure that growth is sustainable over the longer term.

The Government's response to the Barker review of housing supply, which was released in December 2005, took further our commitment to protect and enhance the environment alongside increased housing growth. We announced a number of new environmental initiatives that aim to address environmental pressures and minimise environmental impact. They include a code for sustainable buildings, a commitment to regulate for water efficiency, new planning policies to help manage flood risk, mandating the use of site waste management plans, earmarking 10 per cent. of growth area funding for green space projects, and ensuring that future locations for growth are identified in partnership with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Environment Agency and, when established, Natural England.

We are also working hard to ensure that new locations for housing are not only sustainable, but improve the environmental performance of what we build. The new changes to part L of the building regulations, taken together with changes to strengthen the regulations in 2002, will improve energy efficiency standards by 40 per cent. The tough new standards came into effect on 6 April. They will deliver savings of 0.9 million tonnes of carbon a year by 2010, which is equivalent to the amount of carbon that would be emitted from almost 1 million dwellings built to previous building regulations.

We have also developed the draft code for sustainable homes in partnership with the building industry, so that when people make a purchase, they will be able to see how well their home will perform. It will become a major selling point: people will be able to see how energy efficient their home is, and compare the long-term costs of running their home in the same way in which consumers take into account energy efficiency of household appliances.

We are committed to regulating for water efficiency. This summer, we plan to consult on proposals to drive up water efficiency in new buildings, and existing buildings when fittings are replaced. We are regularly asked, "Why not make the code for sustainable homes mandatory?" We have already strengthened the building regulations to deliver significant efficiency savings. They are mandatory. We are also revising the code to set higher standards. The revised code will form the basis for the next wave of improvements to building regulations. That makes it clear that we are committed to this agenda and to raising standards. However, the code covers a range of issues, so it is complex to impose immediately. Our way of imposing it will give the industry time to catch up with the policy and plan ahead.

The Government are working with a variety of partners to achieve the vision for environmentally sustainable housing. The Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment, which promotes high quality architecture and urban design to raise the standards of the built environment across England, and the Academy for Sustainable Communities, a new national and international centre of excellence for the skills and knowledge needed to create and renew local communities, are key partners in raising the environmental performance of what we build. Through case studies, forums and engagement with industry, we are working together to demonstrate that environmentally sustainable housing is not just an abstract idea, but a reality that can, and more importantly, must be achieved.

Mr. Browne: I applaud those sentiments and many of the Government's initiatives. However, I fear that on the ground, they are not having the effect that the Minister claims. I still see new housing developments being built with few if any amenities to serve the people who live in them. I know that the Minister is busy, but if he is ever looking outside London for a case study of a typical sized town where he might see those policies applied—or not—in practice, he is always welcome to come to Taunton. I shall show him around some of the developments that I have described.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's invitation. He knows that as well as local government responsibilities, I have responsibilities for e-local government and for fire. A new regional fire control centre is being built in Taunton, and it is down on my calendar to go to see it. Perhaps we could combine the two visits when I manage to get that far west.

We are already seeing huge environmental improvements within residential developments, and in response to the point that the hon. Gentleman just made, we intend to do better still. English Partnerships, the national regeneration agency, has recently completed one of the biggest single public land acquisitions ever: the purchase of the disused Oakington barracks in south Cambridgeshire. The 288 hectare site will become the new town of Northstowe, creating about 10,000 new homes.

In developing the site, English Partnerships hopes to achieve up to 50 per cent. reductions on energy and mains water use, compared with conventional housing. It is considering such designs and technology as microgeneration through photovoltaic panels or tiles on roofs, and through windpower; solar water heating through roof mounted collectors, which can supply 50 per cent. of the energy needed for hot water; reduced energy use through better design features, such as putting the larger windows on south facing walls, using reflective green roofs and installing high performance insulation materials; water efficient fittings, such as taps and showerheads; rainwater collection and grey-water recycling for secondary uses, such as flushing toilets; and reduced waste water, through sustainable drainage techniques, which might include on-site treatment and the use of natural watercourses as part of the landscaping. All that is possible. It shows how far we have come.

I welcome this debate as an opportunity to discuss those matters, raise awareness of Government policy and seek views from colleagues about those policies. The hon. Member for Taunton raised the issue of green space projects. Developing growth areas is about not only additional housing, but the creation of sustainable and mixed communities. The strapline for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is "Building Sustainable Communities", as the hon. Gentleman knows. It means providing that green spaces improve the urban environment and create an important place that people can enjoy.

Green spaces provide important environmental functions such as absorbing and filtering airborne and waterborne pollutants, providing shelter and urban cooling, protecting biodiversity and mitigating flood risk. That is why we are earmarking 10 per cent. of our growth area funding for green space projects.

Parkinson's Disease

1 pm

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): I am glad, Mr. Cummings, that you are chairing this debate, which is my first Westminster Hall debate. It is taking place during Parkinson's awareness week. The Parkinson's Disease Society is using this week to launch its "Get it on time" campaign to ensure that people with Parkinson's disease in hospitals and care homes get their medication on time, every time.

This campaign should not be needed. Having worked in health and social services settings for 25 years, managed a joint health and social services team working with people with dementia, written social services contracts and been an inspector with the Care Standards Inspectorate for Wales, I cannot accept that a charity focusing on a long-term degenerative condition should need to launch a campaign that focuses on patients receiving their medication on time. This is not just an issue of patient choice, but an example of health and social care settings failing to provide basic care, basic rights and basic protection and quality of life for those with Parkinson's disease.

I want to make clear the implications for someone with Parkinson's disease of not getting the right medication on time. Parkinson's disease is a degenerative neurological condition for which there is currently no known cure. Consequently, clinical treatment focuses on management and control of symptoms. Parkinson's disease occurs as a result of loss of cells that produce the neurotransmitter dopamine, which is one of the brain's chemical messengers and enables people to perform co-ordinated movements. We do not know why those cells die.

The main treatment for Parkinson's disease is medication, and specific drugs work by replacing or mimicking the action of dopamine. Patients are often on a number of drugs, each of which must be taken throughout the day at specific times. Alun Morgan, who is chair of my local Parkinson's Disease Society, needs a mixture of five tablets and capsules at 7.30, 10.30, 12,30, 2.30 and 6.30. They stimulate a complex, carefully timed release of chemicals to the brain to control his symptoms.

Common conditions and features of Parkinson's disease can include slow walking, poor posture, freezing—that is, inability to move—a running gait of small, unsteady steps with the result that patients are liable to fall, and a tendency to stoop backwards when walking. The proper timing of medication is vital to managing the symptoms. If someone with Parkinson's disease is unable to take their prescribed medication at the right time, the chemical balance is altered and disrupted, and so their disease can become uncontrollable. With an uneven release of dopamine, a person may suddenly be unable to get out of their chair, walk or get out of bed. Their sleep may become disturbed and their bowel and kidney function and digestion may be affected and they may have mood swings, hallucinations, anxiety and fear. All those things may happen because they do not get their medication on time. Once that balance of chemicals has been upset it may take hours, days or even weeks to get it right again and to stabilise it so that the patient and their carer can get on with life again.

The Parkinson's Disease Society is using this week to lobby hospitals, chief executives, chief nursing officers, chief pharmacists, consultant neurologists and geriatricians, and patient advice and liaison services to promote awareness of the disease and the need for prescribing accuracy and access to correct and timely medication. Following the awareness week, the society plans to move on to target the care sector and raising standards in care homes.

With so many problems, new initiatives, developments and questions concerning Parkinson's disease, the society should not have to spend its time and money and its members' resources on raising the attention of professionals to what should be a basic standard of awareness, care and provision in hospitals and care homes. Sadly, the daily experience of patients with Parkinson's disease shows that it does need to spend that time and effort.

From my past working experience, I know that there is no simple reason why people with Parkinson's disease may not get their medication on time. All too often, nurses and care staff do not understand the condition or how important it is to stick to a medication regime. With the new faster pace of the national health service, patients may be admitted to wards where the nurses have no experience or background of nursing patients with Parkinson's disease. Friends who are nurses tell me that with the spread of specialism in nursing, nurses' general bank of information and knowledge about a wide range of conditions is being lost.

On the whole, hospitals do not allow patients to bring into hospital the medication that was dispensed at home by their general practitioner and that works for them. The hospital pharmacy may not have the required medication or it may take some time to obtain it. Sometimes the pharmacy sends up standard-release medication as a substitute for slow-release medication, which substantially alters the nature of the medication for the patient. Meanwhile, the lack of understanding of Parkinson's disease, coupled with the inflexibility of drugs rounds in hospitals and care homes, can have a devastating effect on the patient's functioning.

A survey of Parkinson's disease nurse specialists uncovered the nature and extent of current problems in hospitals. None of the nurses who responded to the survey said that in their hospital medication was always administered on time to Parkinson's disease patients and only one in four said that that normally happens. One in five believed that patients rarely or never received their medication on time, 46 per cent. felt that awareness of medicine management among hospital staff was not high and one in 11 felt that ward staff were very unaware of medicine management in relation to Parkinson's disease. It was noted in additional comments that missing medication caused disturbance and distress to patients and carers and exacerbated the condition, and knowledge of pre-operative and post-operative medicine protocols and the interaction of Parkinson's disease drugs with other medication was described as limited.

If there is slow progress in some hospitals, there is even greater lack of progress in medication management and the rights of patients in care homes. In February this year, the Commission for Social Care Inspection published "Handled with care?" It showed that nearly half of care homes for older people and younger adults, which provided 210,000 resident places, are still not meeting the minimum standards relating to medication. That lack of responsiveness suggests that care homes do not have sufficient incentives to take change on board, despite the risk of prosecution. I saw that at first hand as an inspector. I saw drug rounds not having started two hours after they were due and out-of-date medication on trolleys. I saw medication for a specific patient given to someone else with an adverse reaction as a result.

[Mrs. Madeleine Moon]

The inspectorate's report shows that between 2003 and 2005, the proportion of homes for older people and younger adults meeting the national minimum standards for medication increased to only 65.5 per cent. in homes for older people and to 61.5 per cent. in homes for younger adults. The report states that "the standard for medication is amongst the most infrequently met in care homes, and the improvement in performance is slow compared to the marked improvement seen in many other standards over the past three years."

Inspectorate pharmacists have also identified risks to service users because of the poor standard or complete absence of training for care workers.

That report is about England, but the situation is no different in Wales, where colleagues confirm that the report mirrors practices and difficulties that are experienced there. Why is this happening? Homes must meet standards on medication, which require administration by designated and appropriately trained staff. Training for care staff must be accredited and include basic information about how medicines are used and how to recognise and deal with problems of use, but sadly there is no commonly agreed accreditation programme. I have seen older, experienced staff pass on bad practice to new staff, then sign a training form and call it accredited training.

I do not want to be unremittingly depressing during this debate, as change is happening, and good practice does occur. Changes are made as a result of listening to patients and their carers. One simple change has been to provide pill timers to nurses. They carry the timers and know when the alarm sounds that it is time for the Parkinson's patients to have their medication. Sadly, the timers are not generally available—a Parkinson's patient will find them extremely difficult to get from their local pharmacy—but some hospitals are gradually rolling them out.

Some hospitals have made training videos with their local Parkinson's society and provided laminated posters and information sheets for ward staff. One hospital has a database that highlights Parkinson's patients coming in, so that the pharmacy will know that it has to get in a supply of their medication.

When doing the research for this debate, I was most impressed by a new procedure piloted in a hospital where joined-up thinking has helped solve many of the problems. By establishing medication records within hospital and community pharmacy services, patients' records can be updated if a GP changes their prescription. A new drug chart with a different appearance and colour that highlights the fact that Parkinson's patients have different medication needs reminds nurses that such patients must receive their medication on time.

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): I applaud the time and attention that the hon. Lady has given to the needs of Parkinson's disease sufferers. Does she share my desire for the Minister to speak about the search for potential cures for Parkinson's disease, in particular stem cell research? Britain has a real opportunity to carry on with pioneering work and lead the world in easing the suffering of millions of people around the world who suffer from Parkinson's disease and, for that matter, other terrible genetic conditions. People could benefit on an even greater scale from the work being done here in Britain.

Mrs. Moon: I thank the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) for his intervention. I appreciate his interest in the debate, and especially for staying on after his own debate to take part in this one. I know that he has a personal interest in the matter, as a member of his family has developed Parkinson's disease. I hope that the Minister will be able to give some time to the issue that the hon. Gentleman raises, but today I wish to emphasise the importance of Parkinson's awareness week and the campaign about medication. This matter must end here, this week. We must not have this debate ever again.

In the hospital to which I referred, a new system is being developed for Parkinson's patients to self-administer their medication, which is important. The hospital has been able to develop clinical governance and an assessment that allows staff to decide whether a patient needs nurses to monitor the timing of their medication. If such patients cope at home, why cannot they cope in hospital? They can manage their own medication, and they know that they will get it on time. The hospital also has a system in place to ensure that it is well supplied at all times with Parkinson's medication.

Those arrangements mean that if a patient is deemed capable, they are given a little bum-bag—excuse the expression—containing their medication, which they can take when they are ready. They do not have to wait for nurses to be ready. Patients with Parkinson's are not always able to self-administer their medication, but the campaign and the hospital provided a training regime for all the nursing staff in the hospital.

As well as the "Get it on time" campaign, the Parkinson's Disease Society is making one small financial request for an extension of funding for the medicines management collaborative project, which has done so much good work to promote progress and best practice in medicine management across so many trusts.

There are care standards, clinical governance standards, medicine management frameworks and national service frameworks, yet we are having this debate. It is still necessary for staff working in hospitals and care homes to receive training and to come to understand Parkinson's and why timely medical management is critical. Hospital and care home staff must be asked to listen to people with Parkinson's and to their carers and families. Monitoring and recording of adverse drug incidents due to mistimed medication must increase, hospital pharmacists must stock an easily accessible, broad range of Parkinson's medicine and people with Parkinson's who have the capacity to self-administer must be urged to do so. Finally, people with Parkinson's must get their medication on time, every time.

Those are modest demands. If implemented, they would not only improve the care and protection of those with Parkinson's, but save patients, carers and care and nursing staff from having to cope with the trauma and indignity of Parkinson's patients not being able to stand, walk, think, hold a cup or turn in bed, or becoming confused and hallucinating or being distressed by incontinence. Medication on time means independence, dignity, safety, control, protection—all priorities set out in the Government's dignity in care campaign. Along with medication that is given on time, people with Parkinson's will be given dignity. I look forward to the Minister's reply.

1.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): Thank you, Mr. Cummings, for the opportunity to respond to this debate. I did not compete in the London marathon yesterday, but I am training for a half-marathon that will take place soon. Frankly, it would have been quicker to have run from Liverpool Street this morning. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) on her powerful contribution this afternoon.

This is Parkinson's awareness week. I wish to start by recognising the importance of raising public awareness about those who live with the disease—not just the people who have the disease, but their carers and families. I pay tribute to the Parkinson's Disease Society for the important part that it plays in providing support, advice and information that make a world of difference to so many people who live with Parkinson's every day. The society is an essential part of the support and care that is now on offer in this country, and it should be proud of the work that it has done in the past few years.

The background to today's debate is the transformation of care, particularly for older people. Most people who suffer from Parkinson's disease are over 50, so they are the very people who have benefited from the remarkable changes in the national health service and the social care system over the past few years. Life expectancy is at a record high, and GPs and consultants are now far less likely arbitrarily to deny care to older people in the way that we know happened once upon a time. For example, heart surgery for the over-75s has gone up from 2 per cent. to 10 per cent. That is a good example of how age discrimination has been stamped out in the past few years. That did not happen by accident, but because of our approach, the application of our values and our record investment in the health and social care system.

Not only do older people now get treated when they go into hospital but they get home faster. We have slashed the number of delayed discharges from over 7,000 on any given day in 2001 to just over 2,000 by December 2005. When older people get home, they are provided with far greater support than in the past. Homes with home care are up by more than 52 per cent. since 1998–99, and 40 per cent. more people are supported in living at home than in the past. That is very much the result of implementation of our idea that, for most people, the best care home is their own home. We made that possible through free nursing care, regardless of setting; rapid assessments for social services; and free community equipment and intermediate care services.

There are just five points that I want to make in response to my hon. Friend. The first is about how we conduct care. She talked about the national service framework, and it is important that we have such a framework. It took a long time to develop, and I am particularly grateful to the Parkinson's Disease Society and others for ensuring that there was effective input into it. The NSF focuses on improving services across England; it is an ambitious plan, and we will not achieve it overnight, which is why it has a 10-year time horizon. However, the vision on every page of the NSF is very simple: it is about ensuring that people with neurological conditions live life to the full in 21st century Britain. We have done an enormous amount to transform opportunity over the past few years, and everybody needs to live life to the full, including those with Parkinson's disease.

Mr. Browne: Will the Minister comment on my earlier point? Obviously, we are all enthusiastic about people who suffer from neurological conditions having the highest possible quality of life, but what are the Government doing to support scientific research, including stem cell research, on potentially groundbreaking treatments and cures for terrible conditions such as Parkinson's? How are they supporting and encouraging such scientific activity?

Mr. Byrne: I will be delighted to write to the hon. Gentleman about stem cell research later, but I will touch on research into neurological conditions in a moment.

Although the NSF is in place, we want to go further. That is why we commissioned the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence to publish clinical practice guidelines on Parkinson's disease for the NHS in England and Wales.

My second point relates to our continuing labour, together with the Parkinson's Disease Society, to find a cure and a treatment that can mitigate the conditions suffered by those with Parkinson's disease. At present, the medical profession has no means of curing Parkinson's disease or preventing it from developing. One day, we hope to find a solution through new research, but for now it is possible only to minimise symptoms through medication. That is why the Parkinson's Disease Society and my hon. Friend are right to underline the necessity of delivering medication on time.

We have established £20 million of initiatives to speed up the development of new medical treatments for dementia and neurodegenerative diseases, and the dementias and neurodegenerative disease research network will be led by University college London and the university of Newcastle upon Tyne.

To ensure the effective treatment that is the hallmark of the NHS at its best, however, we need to ensure that medical staff operate with the right knowledge. My hon. Friend mentioned stories about poor practice being passed on from one generation of medical practitioners to another. That is absolutely unacceptable and must be eliminated from the NHS and the social care system.

[Mr. Byrne]

One example of the way in which we are supporting care staff is systems such as PRODIGY, which is an online, up-to-date, interactive decision support tool. It is a source of clinical knowledge that helps health care professionals and patients manage common conditions that are generally seen in primary and first-contact care. I noted with interest that the section of PRODIGY that is devoted to the diagnosis, treatment and management of Parkinson's expressly recommends the Parkinson's Disease Society as a source of information and support. That is an example of how the society is well and truly embedded in our health and social care system.

My fourth point—this is central to my hon. Friend's remarks—is about how we ensure that medicines are properly managed. She is right to talk of the need to administer medicines on time, and I have asked that national minimum standards in social care be reformed to tackle unacceptable practices. As she knows, I recently set up a panel of dignity guardians—experts in the care of our citizens—to advise me on how those standards can best be revised.

Similar reforms are under way in the NHS. A good example is the team based at the National Prescribing Centre, which has helped NHS organisations improve medicines management services since 2001. The medicines management collaborative has worked with 146 primary care trusts throughout England and the hospital medicines management collaborative has helped 44 trusts. The community pharmacy framework collaborative has 28 PCTs participating in its programme, together with a number of other PCTs, and the integrated medicines management programme has 25 trusts participating in its programme.

I was especially glad that my hon. Friend highlighted the importance of the self-administration of medicine. In all the conversations that I have had with societies and organisations that support patients and carers in this field, I have been struck time and time again by the degree to which patients in the NHS often know much more about their conditions than anybody else. We must support that instinct, and that is why the White Paper, which we published in January, sets out ambitious plans for expanding the expert patients programme, and we want to increase the number of places in the programme to up to 100,000.

We also said that we needed to do something else alongside that and that we needed to introduce and expand the expert carers programme. Again, that idea was not thought up in Whitehall, but was brought to us by the Alzheimer's Society. In my constituency office in Hodge Hill, its representatives told me that carers who work with patients or users of social care are working with people whom they love very much and whom they want to support in completely different ways. However, they are often denied information about how they can best help and they are also denied the mutual support and reciprocity that come from peer networks. The expert patients programme and the expert carers programme need to develop those networks so that people can do more to support each other in our communities, and we shall introduce plans in respect of both those programmes a little later this year.

I touch on carers because they are sometimes much neglected in the debate about the health and social care system. There are 6 million carers in this country, and when we went out to the public to ask for their list of priorities for the health and social care White Paper, it was striking how high carers came up that list. That underlines how neglected carers have been in the debate to date. We want to ensure that carers who look after people with Parkinson's disease are given the best possible care themselves, because caring for a person with a long-term condition can be socially, physically and psychologically demanding, and it is important that we provide the support that such carers need.

We listened carefully when carers told us what they needed and we have outlined a new deal for carers. We will update the Prime Minister's strategy on carers. We will also encourage primary care trusts and local authorities to ensure that they have in place a lead to deal with carers' issues so that there is somebody in every community whose day job is to think about carers' needs. In addition, we will introduce the national helpline that carers' organisations have sought for some time.

When I talk to carers in my constituency, I am constantly struck by the fact that they often have no sense of what they are entitled to. The Government supported the Carers (Equal Opportunities) Act 2004, which the House passed last year. It will induce a step change in the support that is available to carers throughout the country. We will add to that through White Paper initiatives such as emergency home-based respite care. We will also continue support through the carer's grant, which will have been worth about £1 billion by the end of 2007–08. Those are all important aspects of improving the quality of life of those with Parkinson's disease and their families.

My final point relates to the need for further reform. The health White Paper set out an ambitious programme for shifting care out of hospitals and into the community, which is exactly where people want to see it—they want a national health service that is available not only around the clock, but around the corner. Throughout that reform programme, we must send a clear signal that this is ultimately about standards. That is why we have introduced the dignity in care campaign, which underlines the point that treating people with dignity is about treating them in the way that they want to be treated, not the way that we want to be treated. That is why we are taking steps to regulate the social care work force and why we have introduced the safeguarding vulnerable adults legislation. That is also why we are cracking down on elder abuse and working with Comic Relief to understand the issue in greater depth.

John Cummings (in the Chair): Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

Police Station Help Desks (West Yorkshire)

1.30 pm

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): It is a pleasure to speak in a debate that you are chairing, Mr. Cummings. I am grateful to have the opportunity to debate a subject that is causing much distress among local residents in my constituency and throughout West Yorkshire as a whole—the closure of local police station help desks. I am also grateful to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), for taking part in this debate. He is a reasonable man and I hope that he will be able to offer some hope to my constituents, for whom the problem is causing much distress.

West Yorkshire police has already decided to close 12 police station help desks. They are at Ovenden, Heckmondwike, Sowerby Bridge, Rothwell, Ossett, Normanton, Brighouse, Cleckheaton, Batley, Otley and, more importantly to me, Shipley and Bingley. West Yorkshire police has also said:

"Further work to identify if any other help desks should close is being carried out and this will also take into account the working hours of help desks, some of which will be reduced, however the details of these have yet to be finalised".

It is clear that the list is not final and that more could follow.

I hope that you will forgive me for being somewhat parochial, Mr. Cummings, and allow me to focus on the two police station help desks at Bingley and Shipley that are to close in my constituency. The closures would mean that no police station would be open to the public throughout my constituency at any time of the day. That is a disgrace. The Government and West Yorkshire police alike often sing the praises of neighbourhood policing and stress its importance. Indeed, I support the concept of neighbourhood policing, which is important to the general public. However, it would appear that I have a different understanding of neighbourhood policing from that of the police and the Government.

Neighbourhood policing should surely be about much more than seeing an extra officer walking down the street, although that would certainly be welcome. Surely neighbourhood policing should be about how close the police are to the community and how accessible they are. Having police stations open to the public is a vital part of neighbourhood policing. I would be grateful for the Minister's view on the importance to the Government of police stations in delivering their programme of neighbourhood policing.

Shipley used to be the centre of its own police division. Now it will not even have a police station open to the public. Are we really seeing a move towards more neighbourhood policing? From my constituents' perspective we are moving further away from neighbourhood policing, towards something much more remote.

The closure of these police stations to the public is not merely symbolic; it will have a real impact on people. What will happen, for example, when somebody in the centre of Shipley or Bingley sees something that they want or need to report to the police, but they do not happen to have the phone number to call at hand? What will happen to people who want to hand in lost property? What will happen when courts ask people to report to a local police station as a condition of bail? What will happen when, say, a motorist is asked to take their documents to a local police station? The answer for many people in my constituency will be that they cannot do so, because there will be nowhere to go locally. People will probably end up having to go to the divisional headquarters in Keighley. Surely that is unacceptable.

No doubt the Minister will say that those are operational matters that are best left to the police, without Government interference. I would certainly welcome a move towards allowing the police to work without Government interference, but West Yorkshire police does not want to take that decision. In a letter sent to me on 18 March, Chief Constable Colin Cramphorn says:

"I of course understand your concerns and indeed your unhappiness; none of us are happy about making cuts but we have been left no choice. This year's budget settlement, together with the failure to apply the needs based funding formula has cost West Yorkshire Police £15 million."

There is now talk in the local newspapers of West Yorkshire police needing to find savings of more than £17 million. It is clear from that letter that we are not talking about an operational decision entered into willingly by the police, but something that has been forced on them by the Government's inadequate funding. The police have said they are going ahead simply because they need to save £700,000 in their budget.

The police are placing the blame for the closures on the Government, so could the Minister explain why the funding for West Yorkshire police has left it so strapped for cash that it needs to take such drastic measures? Are we seeing another example of the Government presiding over feast and then famine in our public services? What will the Minister do to make up the chronic shortfall in funding for West Yorkshire police?

I am not entirely sure how West Yorkshire police has calculated a saving of £700,000 from closing these police station help desks. The force has said that the police stations themselves will not close and that they will still be used as operating bases. They will still be open, lit and heated; it is just that the public will not be able to have access to them. I therefore do not see how any savings can be made on the buildings.

West Yorkshire police has also said that it intends to avoid redundancies, so it appears that there will be no saving on staff costs either. Without savings on the buildings or on staff costs, I am not entirely sure how the figure of £700,000 was reached. Perhaps the Minister will be able to help me out and explain how such savings can be made without the closure of the buildings or staff cuts. Many people are concerned that the closure of the police stations will follow shortly to realise these savings. I intend to take up that point with the assistant chief constable when I meet him on 5 May to discuss the closures further.

The closure of the help desk at Shipley is even more of a scandal. It has already been closed for weeks, for refurbishment—yes, refurbishment. West Yorkshire police has spent tens of thousands of pounds refurbishing the help desk at Shipley, yet it will not even reopen to the public so that we can see it in all its splendour and glory. Surely the Minister must agree that that is a scandalous waste of taxpayers' money and more waste in our public services.

The Minister might also be interested to know that, at a time when West Yorkshire police has had to close these help desks, it is delivering an eight-page newspaper to every household in the county. Surely if money needs to be saved, that should be the first thing to go. The newspaper does not even inform people of the closure of the help desks. You could not make it up, Mr. Cummings. Do the Government encourage their money to be spent on that wasteful propaganda or does the Minister agree that a police force should not be able to afford to dish out a newspaper full of propaganda that nobody is interested in when it cannot even afford to keep its police station help desks open?

West Yorkshire police says that the help desks to close have been chosen because fewer than 100 people a week use them. That might be the case, but it does not reflect the importance that help desks have as a reassurance to the local community. The small number of people who use them is also due to their opening hours. Bingley police station is open from 9 am to 1 pm, Monday to Saturday, while Shipley police station's opening hours are only slightly more generous, with an extra two hours in the afternoon.

If the police can afford to open the stations to the public for only four hours a day, which bright spark decided that the best hours to open were between 9 am and 1 pm, when the fewest crimes are committed and most people are at work? No wonder hardly anybody is using the help desks. Has there been some encouragement to open the help desks at the most inconvenient times, so that we have fewer operational police stations and an excuse to get rid of them? Does the Minister agree that these stations should be open at hours that suit the public, not the people working in them?

If all these police stations are to be closed to the public for good, surely a trial run could be held with them opening in the evening to see how many people used them then. We could then ascertain whether people would use the local station if they had the opportunity to do so. Would the Minister agree to fund such a trial, keeping those stations open in the evening for a limited time to see how they were used?

The closures were forced through without public consultation, and with no one from the police authority or the senior ranks of West Yorkshire police even having the decency to come to Shipley and Bingley to explain why the help desks were being closed. If it was such a good idea to close them, I would have expected someone to explain the rationale behind the decision and to tell the local community why it was such a good idea.

People in my constituency feel extremely strongly about the matter. I have conducted one survey after another in my constituency, and crime and the fear of crime is constantly said to be the most important issue. Keeping local police stations open, even for a few hours a day, would at least give people the reassurance that the police were close at hand and that they cared about crime in the local community.

A 900-signature petition from people concerned about the closure of the help desks was collected in only a few days by local residents Andrew Rowley and David Herdson, to whom I am grateful. It was presented to me last week. The fact that they were able to collect so many signatures in such a short time shows the strength of feeling in my constituency about the closure of the help desks; it shows how important they are in reassuring the local community. Some who signed the petition had used the police stations and some had not, but all felt that it was important that they should be able to do so.

The Minister could prevent the closures by giving West Yorkshire the necessary funding. The £15 million cut referred to by the chief constable in his letter to me would be extremely welcome, as it would safeguard the stations. Even £700,000 would keep them open to the public. Only £100,000 would keep the two stations in my constituency open to the public; that is all that would be needed to safeguard those two help desks. Given that the cost to West Yorkshire police of its unnecessary merger with other forces has been calculated at £50 million, with a nationwide cost of about £500 million, that is a drop in the ocean.

Keeping police stations open to the public is surely far more important than spending money on new logos and mottos for a regional police force. If the Minister were to ask my constituents, or even his, what else could be done with the money, how many of them does he think would ask for a regional police force? Does he not think that most would prefer to see the money spent on more police officers, and allowing more police stations to remain open for longer? I believe that the stations should be open for longer, not closed. Not only is it a bad move, it is a move in the wrong direction. I therefore urge the Minister to find the money to keep the police stations open. This issue demonstrates to us all how important neighbourhood policing is to the Government.

I am grateful for having been given the opportunity to put the case for keeping these stations open. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to save them.

1.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) on obtaining this debate. He is right that in his constituency and in mine—and, I believe, in every constituency—crime and the fear of crime is a top priority. It is certainly a Government priority to ensure that we deliver greater safety and security to our communities. He is also right that a matter of such intense debate in his locality should be brought to Parliament, so that his and his constituents' views and concerns can be aired, and I congratulate him on doing so.

The hon. Gentleman anticipated one aspect of my response early in his speech. The management of the police estate in West Yorkshire, the allocation of resources and budget decisions, and the ownership of police stations and how they function is a matter for local decision-taking—it is a matter for the chief police constable and the police authority, although they should do it in a way that is open to public scrutiny and debate. The hon. Gentleman referred also to the fact that the assistant chief constable is anxious to enter into discussions with him and his colleagues. People want to have ready access to the police service. It is an important aspect of modern policing, so any change in the way that services are delivered should be taken only after surveys and appropriate consultation have been undertaken. That was certainly the case in relation to access to police station help desks in West Yorkshire.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the opening times of help desks is not the sole determinant of the effectiveness or accessibility of the police. There are other more modern methods of taking the police service out into the community in a more accessible way—in shops on the high street, in kiosks and in mobile police stations, which are particularly relevant and helpful in rural areas. We need to get the right balance between access to the service and the visible presence of police officers and community support officers on the street. None the less, I applaud the hon. Gentleman's support for neighbourhood policing.

West Yorkshire police authority's decision was informed by research undertaken by Thornton management service, which was commissioned by the police authority to investigate the number of visitors attending front-counter help desks at police stations throughout West Yorkshire. That commission was the result of data provided by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary comparing the proportion of personnel working in various functions across the country. The HMIC data highlighted the fact that West Yorkshire had a higher than average proportion of personnel working in help-desks functions. Not only did the consultants gather data; they also made observations about the way in which the help desks were used. They concluded that, for reasons of efficiency, it made sense to close some desks, particularly those with low levels of activity. It was not done simply to close the service; it was done because it would allow the staff and resources currently used to keep those desks open to be redeployed.

That required not only number crunching but professional judgment and local knowledge. Although the criteria used to judge low activity was fewer than 100 visits a week, regard was given to the circumstances of the area. For example, although Todmorden police station had fewer than 100 visits a week, it remains open because it is in a more remote area. It is worth recording that the consultants found one station that had 54 visits a week by members of the public, but that 2,190 visits a week were made to another.

The police authority decided to consider the efficiency and effectiveness of the system to ensure that resources are used to the fullest effect. Like the hon. Gentleman, I have a list of the police stations that are affected. Most of those that are to remain open had help desks that were already open 24 hours a day, seven days a week. They will continue to provide that service.

The hon. Gentleman noted that the help desk at the Bingley police station was open only from 9 am till 1 pm. He invited me to say that if it was open for longer, more people would visit it. That may be true, but opening it for longer would require more resources; it would be more expensive. Again, that is a decision for the police authority.

I emphasise that West Yorkshire police has assured me that it is listening to the concerns of the hon. Gentleman and others. Assistant Chief Constable Crompton has written to Members of Parliament and local authority councillors to explain the changes and invite dialogue. I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman is taking up that offer on 5 May, I think—

Philip Davies indicated assent.

Paul Goggins: That date is close to but just after local elections. The meeting will give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity to raise several of the points that he has raised today. He asked a perfectly legitimate question, which I cannot answer, about why money has been spent on refurbishing Shipley when, he alleges, that resource will not be used properly. I do not know the answer to that; I trust the hon. Gentleman's assertion in this debate, but he will get a better answer from Assistant Chief Constable Crompton than I can give him. He will also be able to ask him how the figure of £700,000 was estimated as the overall saving, and about several other practical issues.

Not everyone shares the hon. Gentleman's view—not even everyone in his party. I noticed with interest a report in the Brighouse Echo—a journal which I regularly look at—on 14 April, I think, which quoted the Conservative candidate for the Brighouse ward in next month's council elections, Alan Taylor, as saying that "pedestrians and elderly people felt the police station was too far from the town centre."

It went on to say that he claimed there had been "posturing and over reaction" to the proposed closure. I do not allege that the hon. Gentleman is posturing or overreacting, but there is clearly a debate to be had. There will be concerns within and across parties. The dialogue offered by the assistant chief constable is welcome.

Most people contact the police by telephone. We should encourage them to do that and to do it in an appropriate way. With the commitment to neighbourhood policing, we want not only for there to be telephone contact, but for officers to be known to local people by name, for mobile phone numbers to be available so that ready contact can be made, and higher visibility of officers on the street. All that is important in taking work forward.

The question of reducing and, in some places, closing police station help desks needs to be set against the overall record of the West Yorkshire police authority and the police officers in its area. The build-up of resources, their effectiveness and their deployment to reduce crime and make the area safer are impressive in the hon. Gentleman's area, as is the commitment to neighbourhood policing. West Yorkshire had a record 5,691 police officers in September 2005, which is 482 more than in March 1997 and an increase of 60 within a year. West Yorkshire is deeply committed to the introduction of community support officers and the development of their role. There were 433 CSOs there by last September, and those numbers will rise, not least with the Chancellor's commitment in the Budget to bring forward money to ensure that we can recruit CSOs in even greater numbers.

There is a strong commitment to neighbourhood policing, which is clearly a great priority for the Government. We recognise that citizens and communities want local policing that enables greater police understanding of local priorities and problems and enables them to tackle the issues that are most important to local people. We have committed ourselves to working with the police in West Yorkshire and elsewhere to ensure that neighbourhood policing is introduced to every community, including those in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, by April 2007. Initially, we thought that it might be 2008 before that development could occur, but the Chancellor's Budget commitment has enabled us to bring matters forward.

When neighbourhood policing teams are operating nationwide, communities will have access to policing services through a named point of contact. I accept that front desks and help desks are important, but it is that contact and access to individual police officers that is at the heart of our neighbourhood policing strategy, and that is what will make a difference. I am informed by West Yorkshire police that it has set up the framework for neighbourhood policing, which has increased local access to police throughout West Yorkshire. Teams of officers and community support officers already offer a highly visible and popular service. Increasing numbers of people are attending surgeries at police contact points. These are some of the innovations that I mentioned. They are held in accessible locations such as shops, schools and places of worship. West Yorkshire is firmly committed to rolling out these new and more modern places of contact.

West Yorkshire police has also recently established a neighbourhood policing website, which provides relevant, up-to-date information and a means of direct contact for people in every neighbourhood. Our constituents increasingly use new technology and go on to the internet to gain more information about their local police and public services, which is a good thing and will give more immediate contact.

West Yorkshire police has performed impressively on crime reduction. The latest crime figures for West Yorkshire show considerable improvement. A comparison of the figures for 2004–05 with those for 2003–04 shows that robbery offences are down 41 per cent., burglaries are down 37 per cent., and the theft of motor vehicles is down 28 per cent. These are impressive developments in West Yorkshire, which I am sure that the hon. Gentleman applauds, as do I, because it comes from the determined and focused efforts of police in his area.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of funding and budgets; I have responded to debates in this place secured by Members from West Yorkshire. To be clear, the general Government grant for 2006–07 for West Yorkshire is £306.2 million. That is an increase of 3.2 per cent. over the comparable figure for 2005–06. However, a number of other elements need to be added to that. There was £800,000 in adjustments from budgets in earlier years. The police authority will also receive £4.32 million in a special formula grant, which is a consolidation of four former specific grants that will enable the authority to operate more flexibly. It will also benefit from about £41.6 million in funding for specific initiatives and capital provision. Therefore, the final police authority budget for 2006–07 is £380.2 million, which is a cash increase of £14.5 million compared with the year before.

I acknowledge, as I have in earlier debates, that if a strict application of the needs-based formula had been made, an extra £14.8 million would have been given to West Yorkshire police. We have to make a balanced judgment when it comes to ensuring that needs are met and that we have stability in the police service throughout the country. That is why we have floors and ceilings in relation to the way in which we set our budget. We want to retain that stability in the system, but we also want to move, as and when we can, to a situation in which the needs formula is more closely adopted.

The hon. Gentleman invited me to give an extra £700,000 to West Yorkshire police authority, but that is money that I do not have. As I said at the start, this is a matter for local decision making. However, even if we had been able to follow the needs assessment more clearly and give more money to West Yorkshire, questions of efficiency still arise. If there is inefficiency in the way in which the front-desk service is provided in police stations in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and if it needs to be made more efficient, that should be dealt with by his police authority. I would expect local Members of Parliament to look for those efficiencies.

Philip Davies: Will the Minister give way?

Paul Goggins: There is no time really; we have only seconds left.

I conclude by saying that this is a local matter for local debate and dialogue. I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman is engaging with that and I am sure that he will look forward to his meeting on 5 May.

Question put and agreed to.

Maritime Industry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Claire Ward.]

9.30 am

Ms Katy Clark (North Ayrshire and Arran) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the fundamental issues relating to the Government's support for the maritime industry, the rights and responsibilities of employers in the industry and the employment rights of those who work in it.

The Government have a proud record in many areas. We have a strong record on employment. Indeed, we have created 2.4 million new jobs since we came to power in 1997. We also have a proud record on equality issues, particularly on race relations, and one of our flagship policies was the creation of the national minimum wage legislation. However, much of my speech will focus on a forgotten group of workers who have not benefited from many of those positive Government initiatives—some of our seafarers.

When the Labour party came into office in 1997, we recognised the crisis facing the UK maritime industry and UK seafarers. We also knew of the shipping industry's importance to Britain's economy, our dependence as an island nation on sea transport, the sustainable environmental benefits of sea transport and, not least, the industry's importance to national security. Shortly after the Labour party came to power, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister set out the Government's plan to boost the shipping industry. A shipping working group was set up and tasked with considering the key issues of enabling maximum economic benefit to be obtained from the shipping industry, reversing the decline of the UK merchant shipping fleet, increasing the employment and training of seafarers, and encouraging shipowners and the wider maritime industry to devote more resources to the maritime fleet.

The group made 33 recommendations—I shall not go through them all—and the major headings give a flavour of the debate at that time. They included funding training, facilitating training, improving the employment environment, regulating to improve British seafarers' prospects, safeguarding the employment rights of British seafarers, improving the fiscal environment, opening up new opportunities for UK shipping and the operation of the UK register for shipping.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend is right to list the many improvements that have been made in the pay and conditions of millions of British workers. The tonnage tax regime was indeed a brave attempt to improve employment and training in the maritime industry, but does she agree that the next and final step towards making it work would be to ensure that there were legal obligations and that employment and training were not just optional extras for UK-registered fleet owners?

Ms Clark: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, and I hope to make the same point during my speech.

Many of the shipping working group's recommendations were taken up, and many of the policies that the Government adopted have been successful for the shipping industry. The group made a wide range of recommendations and, as is usual, the Government accepted some, but not others. The group's work led the Government to lay out their strategy in December 1998 in a policy document called "British shipping: Charting a new course". The document outlined a range of policy initiatives to address the decline in the numbers of UK ships and seafarers. The centrepiece was the policy to which my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) referred—the introduction of a tonnage tax, which all parts of the industry agreed should be the way forward. The tonnage tax provides significant support to the shipping industry and is worth about £40 million a year.

I shall focus on three main aspects of Government policy towards the maritime industry: the tonnage tax and the industry's failure to deliver voluntarily on training and employment; the section 9 exemption in the Race Relations Act 1976, which makes it legal to employ foreign national seafarers on inferior wages and conditions; and the failure to apply the national minimum wage regulations to foreign seafarers in UK territorial waters.

The first issue is the tonnage tax and the industry's failure to deliver on training and employment—and of course we must put it in context. As I said, the Government are to be congratulated on responding to the fall in the number of UK seafarers by outlining the measures contained in their policy document "British shipping: Charting a new course". One of the key objectives that the Government set themselves was to increase the training and employment of UK seafarers, and they said that the tonnage tax was the most important of the measures to deliver on that objective.

The tonnage tax represents a significant concession to the shipping industry. Rather than paying the normal form of tax on their profits, companies that enter the tonnage tax regime pay a notional tax levy according to the size of the company fleet. However, applying the criteria that the Government set themselves for judging the success of the tonnage tax regime—the increased training and employment of UK seafarers—makes it clear that there has been little benefit in terms of the training and employment of ratings, although there has been limited success in relation to cadets. I believe that the policy's failure, particularly in relation to ratings, has resulted from the scheme's voluntary basis.

The UK is an island nation and is heavily dependent on ships for its trade, but the number of our seafarers has declined dramatically in the past few years. UK seafaring ratings numbers have fallen from 30,000 in 1980 to just over 9,000 today. Since its introduction in 2000, the tonnage tax has not stopped the decline in training or employment, particularly for UK seafaring ratings. In fact, employment opportunities continue to decline, and the levels of training for new entrant UK ratings positions is falling. Although it is difficult to get figures, my understanding is that only 50 British ratings trainees came into the industry in 2004–05, and it is predicted that there will be fewer this year.

Despite all the good intentions, the tonnage tax exemption cannot be a seen as a success for ratings. Although shipping companies must train cadets, there is no legal requirement to employ officers or ratings; indeed, there is no obligation even to train UK ratings—companies must simply consider UK ratings' training and employment options. Unfortunately, therefore, the majority of vessels that enter the UK register employ no UK seafaring ratings.

The tonnage tax concession to the industry was worth more than £61 million between its introduction in 2000 and the end of the financial year 2003–04. The latest figures from the Inland Revenue show that the cost to the taxpayer in each of the past two financial years was about £40 million. The concession has clearly been successful in bringing more ships on to the UK register, although there is no obligation to register in the UK to qualify for the concession. However, the concession has not delivered increased employment for UK seafarers. It is therefore important that the Government follow through on their commitment to increase the employment of UK seafarers. We now have even fewer UK ratings than in 2000, when the concession was first introduced. I note that the Chamber of Shipping gave a commitment to increase the training of seafarers, both officers and ratings, by 25 per cent. year on year prior to the introduction of the tonnage tax in 1999. That would have doubled the number of ratings in training, but the number has declined from about 2,000 in 1999, when the tonnage tax was introduced, to about 50 more recently. The concern is that those figures will continue to fall.

The Minister will be aware that late in 2004 the Department for Transport and the Inland Revenue published the results of their review of the tonnage tax. At the time the Government decided to delay the implementation of the link between the tonnage concession and the employment of UK seafarers. Instead, the previous Minister with responsibility for shipping referred the employment issues of the tonnage tax to a working party—the Department for Transport's shipping task force.

The Transport Committee also considered the matter. It welcomed the Government's decision to include the consideration of proposals for a training commitment for ratings in the expanded terms of reference of the shipping task force working party. The Committee also said that there was a pressing need for information about what companies in the tonnage tax regime were doing to honour their commitment to ratings. Without that, the Committee stated, it would be difficult to disagree with the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, the ratings' trade union, which contended that the present voluntary commitments amounted to nothing by way of an industry commitment.

Not surprisingly, the shipping task force working group was not able to reach an agreement about an employment link for UK seafarers, as the Chamber of Shipping refused to agree to any commitments on training or employment of UK ratings. Instead, the working party made a series of recommendations, including an increase of funding for training, a crew relief costs scheme and an extension to the seafarers' earnings deductions tax concessions.

As yet, no details have been made available by the Chamber of Shipping or the Department for Transport on how shipping companies are honouring their commitment to consider the training and employment of ratings. I am aware that the Department for Transport has produced a short summary that gives some indication of the number of companies employing UK seafarers, but it gives no specific company training or employment figures.

Before agreeing to the tonnage tax, an independent inquiry into the tax was commissioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The report, by Lord Alexander of Weedon, recommended the adoption of the tonnage tax regime. He said of the regime:

"Its extra cost to the industry of about £4.5 million a year after five years is small when compared against the financial and other advantages of the tonnage tax."

Given that the commitment to ratings was less than the trade union was seeking, he asked the industry to consider exploring with the Department for Transport ways to ensure the prospect of further commitments and advancement on those matters.

The reality is that that work has never been done; given the obvious failings of the current position, which is voluntary, I sincerely hope that one outcome of today's debate will be that the issues are reconsidered and a formal link is adopted. I know that the Government are aware of the problem, and that the Minister promised a decision on training and employment being linked to the tonnage tax soon. I urge him to put compulsory measures in place to ensure that the original trade-off, about which the Government were very clear, and the original commitments, which were very much what the country and the shipping industry need, which were very clear—they are what the country and the shipping industry need—are made a reality.

The second issue that I wish to raise is discrimination against seafarers under the Race Relations Act 1976. The Minister will be aware that historically exemptions relating to seafarers have always been found in race relations legislation. Indeed, when in opposition, my right hon. Friend who is now the Deputy Prime Minister said that those exemptions were a national disgrace.

Although the Government have amended that legislation, it is still perfectly lawful to discriminate against seafarers on the ground of their nationality. The effect is that companies are able to bring in foreign national workers at lower rates of pay and with worse conditions, so undercutting the existing work force and leading to job losses and reductions in the number of new British recruits.

The Government took action by amending the 1976 Act. The sections amended related to the treatment of seafarers recruited abroad to work on UK ships, and the amendments made it lawful to discriminate on grounds of nationality rather than race, colour or ethnic origin, which had been the position until then. For the exemptions to apply, seafarers have to reside and be recruited abroad. The crux of the matter is that race relations legislation specifically allows seafarers recruited abroad to be treated differently from UK seafarers even though they may be employed and living on board UK workplaces for lengthy periods.

Seafarers of many nationalities work in the United Kingdom and on UK-flagged ships. In some situations, UK seafarers work beside foreign nationals—on the same ships and in the same departments—but because of UK employment law, the British workers earn more and have better terms and conditions than their foreign counterparts. The Minister will be aware that representations have been made to the Government over a considerable time. Despite that, however, the discrimination continues and the employment of existing UK seafarers remains increasingly precarious.

In 2004, the European Commission stated that European Union seafarers should be paid according to the home rate of the flag of the ship that they sail on regardless of their place of residence. That means that Spanish, Polish or any other EU nationals should not be discriminated against compared to resident UK seafarers employed on UK-flagged ships. However, I understand that EU nationals are still being paid a lower rate.

Shortly after the European Commission made its position clear, the Department for Transport said that, on receipt of legal advice, it would conduct a review of sections 8 and 9 of the Race Relations Act 1976. However, no more proposals have been made. The Minister may be aware that RMT, the union that represents maritime workers, has submitted complaints to the European Commission arguing that section 9 of the 1976 Act is in breach of the European treaty provision on non-discrimination and the free movement of goods. Complaints have also been lodged with a range of other organisations, including the International Labour Organisation and the international committee on economic, social and cultural rights, and complaints have been launched with regard to the European social charter.

I understand that the trade union is also considering taking formal action in the High Court to stop discrimination against foreign national seafarers, whether or not they are from the European Union. I urge the Minister to consider the matter again and to bring forward legislation to outlaw discrimination against UK seafarers once and for all.

At the moment, shipowners continue to enjoy an exemption from the provisions of the 1976 Act. That allows them to pay exploitative rates of pay to foreign national seafarers recruited abroad. In many situations, the national minimum wage does not apply to UK seafarers on board UK ships while they are in UK waters, as the legislation applies only when ships are in port or in UK internal waters. That lack of regulation and social protection for seafarers has meant their continual replacement by low-cost foreign national seafarers.

Perhaps the most high-profile recent example of problems of this nature was the Irish Ferries dispute last year, which was not, of course, a British dispute. It led to high-profile industrial action and got media attention, but such issues often do not end up in the national press. On that occasion, Irish Ferries offered its work force the option of voluntary redundancies or a cut in pay and conditions of up to 50 per cent., and there was an industrial dispute, which, hon. Members may recall, was settled only after the work force had a sit-in on the ferries. In most situations that have affected British workers, things have been far quieter. When British workers are forced to compete with low-paid foreign nationals, they often realise that the writing is on the wall and accept job losses and redundancies because of the legal position in which they are put.

It is not acceptable for existing work forces to be continually replaced with cheap labour brought in from outside because British employment law does not ensure that there is a level playing field. I have a constituency interest in this matter because my constituency includes island communities, to which a number of ferries operate. Ferries are very much affected by the legislation. In recent years, there has been a creeping situation in which foreign workers are brought in on lower rates of pay and worse conditions. As a result, the existing British work force has been losing out, and new British workers are not being recruited. New foreign recruits tend to be employed on lower terms and conditions because they do not have that employment law protection.

In my constituency, the situation is particularly relevant because Caledonian MacBrayne, which operates many of the services to the island communities and thus provides a lifeline, and which is effectively a publicly-owned company, is being put into a tendering position. While that process is clearly very much a devolved matter within the remit of the Scottish Executive, I am very aware, as a Scottish Member of Parliament, that the Executive can operate only within the legal restrictions put in place by this place. Current employment law puts many of the workers who provide these services at risk. The tendering process may lead to Caledonian MacBrayne continuing to provide the service, and the process itself might not lead to the displacement of the existing work force and the employment of low-cost foreign national seafarers, but the law does not prevent the use of cheap labour to undercut the terms and conditions of the work force.

That significant development in Scotland is yet another reason why we need to reconsider this area of law and ensure that we introduce employment law to protect the rights of existing work forces on ferries and future recruits.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing the debate and on the way in which she is presenting her case. As I, too, have islands in my constituency, I share her concern about CalMac. The Government could help by accepting the recommendation of the shipping working group that employers' national insurance contributions for the shipping industry should be alleviated. The Government's rejection of that recommendation has forced CalMac to transfer all its employees to a company based outwith the UK. Does the hon. Lady agree that that could lead to a worsening of conditions, and that the Government should accept the recommendation?

Ms Clark: I shall not comment specifically on the issue of national insurance contributions. I am aware of that development, and I think it unfortunate that the legal framework within which Caledonian MacBrayne is forced to operate is leading to it having to use devices of that nature simply to try to secure its continued existence. That company has provided lifeline services to island communities for generations. Those of us who live in areas that are served by such ferries, or who have been there on holiday, are aware of the affection in which that company is held in Scotland and its island communities. If something is not broken, we should not try to fix it, so it is unfortunate that those services are at risk because of the nature of European Union regulations and employment legislation. Therefore, I agree with the sentiments of the hon. Gentleman.

The third issue that I shall raise today is the national minimum wage and how it applies to seafarers. In addition to the exemption under the Race Relations Act, shipowners have managed to gain a favourable interpretation of national minimum wage legislation—a flagship Labour policy that was implemented by this Labour Government. The Department of Trade and Industry has interpreted the legislation in such a way that foreign national seafarers' entitlement to the national minimum wage applies only on UK registered ships when they are in port or in internal UK waters, as opposed to UK territorial waters. If that interpretation is correct, there is an urgent need to amend the legislation so that coverage is properly extended to all who work within UK territorial waters.

There are also concerns about the inadequate provisions for enforcing the legislation on board British ships. The Maritime and Coastguard Agency is the only body that can logically carry out that commitment. Unfortunately, it is not required to do so, and the task is carried out by the DTI, which does not necessarily have the requisite specialist knowledge to deal with the complexities of the industry.

The UK has jurisdiction over UK territorial waters which extend for 12 miles. I am aware that the Minister has said that the legislation is not as he would like it to be. I would be grateful if he would use this opportunity to issue a guidance note or introduce a statutory order to ensure that the UK minimum wage applies to UK ships in UK territorial waters, because under the current legislative framework British workers are being put in a vulnerable position.

These loopholes in the law need to be filled. The Government are very much one who promote equality for all; action has to be taken to ensure that all workers employed in the UK have the full protection of the Race Relations Act and national minimum wage legislation. The minimum wage legislation is one of the most important policies introduced by Labour since it came to power, as millions of people have benefited from it. In opposition, we heard time and again what damage it would cause the British industry, but many of those comments were scaremongering. Similarly, many of the arguments now being advanced as to why we cannot apply the national minimum wage to seafarers and foreign national seafarers do not hold water and will not stand the test of time.

Our manifesto last year made it clear that tax credits and minimum wage legislation were a way of ensuring that work paid for everybody. We also made it clear that we would implement Low Pay Commission recommendations for everybody. We have a proud record on such issues.

I think that this is a time to recognise that we have done a huge amount of good work for the maritime industry. Many of the Government's policies on shipping have been a great success. However, we have perhaps not been successful in ensuring that British people continue to work the ships that operate out of our country. Today, I would ask the Minister to assure us that he will continue to review the Race Relations Act and will work with all parties involved in the process to ensure that the appalling discrimination against foreign national seafarers is stopped once and for all.

We rightly sing the praises of the national minimum wage, which will be a lasting tribute to the Government. However, I do not believe that minimum wage legislation was ever intended to exclude some of the most vulnerable in our society: migrant seafarers. Will the Minister reconsider that issue?

Finally, Labour has a good record of using tax incentives to work with business and boost employment. I have already spoken about the huge strides that Labour has made in that area since we came to power. In my constituency, we have seen an increase of more than 25 per cent. in levels of employment. That story is repeated throughout the country. However, when the policy was put in place, the trade-off was that concessions would be provided to the shipping industry in exchange for the employment and training. We are often told by business that it is not possible to get something for nothing, yet the tonnage tax regime seems to be a situation where, when it comes to jobs, there has been no return for UK seafaring ratings. I ask the Minister to reconsider those issues.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): It is apparent that a number of hon. Members wish to participate in the debate. I have the names of four before me already. I intend to call the Front Benchers at 10.30 and would therefore urge brevity on hon. Members if all are to be allowed to speak.

10.2 am

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) on the thorough way in which she introduced the debate. When preparing for the debate, I wondered who the Minister would be, and which Department would be represented. The last time that I participated in a debate on the maritime industry, the Minister was from the Department of Trade and Industry. Having heard the hon. Lady's speech, I understand why the Minister is from the Department for Transport.

I declare a non-pecuniary interest as an honorary vice-president of the Society of Maritime Industries. My constituency, Fareham, has a strong interest in the maritime sector, particularly the leisure sector. The River Hamble forms the boundary of my constituency and is well known for being an area for the leisure industry. For example, Moody's Boatyard, which was once a yacht builder, is now principally into yacht sales. We have a marina builder, Walcon Marine. The Westminster Dredging Company not only keeps our sea lanes free, but uses the results of its dredging to supply the aggregates industry. Warsash maritime college trains many of the people who we see on our merchant ships—not only UK-flagged ships, but ships flagged across the world. There is a strong international element to the student base. In south-east Hampshire, the maritime sector is dominated by VT Group. I will return to VT Group, formerly Vosper Thornycroft, later.

I want to reflect for a moment on the comment that I made at the beginning of my speech about who might speak for the Government on this occasion. A number of Departments have a strong interest in the maritime industry. It is sometimes difficult for those working in that successful sector to identify the lead voice.

The DTI has a marine unit, which has been effective in trying to improve dialogue, particularly on issues such as the defence industrial strategy. Of course, the DTI is going through a process of increased regionalisation, which might lead to a dilution of its support for the maritime industry.

The Ministry of Defence is the principal customer for UK shipbuilding. Its defence industrial strategy has a strong strand of the marine industrial strategy running alongside it. The DFT takes the lead in many issues that affect the maritime industry, but when we consider the research and development framework that has been discussed by the EU, should the DFT or the DTI speak on such issues?

It is important that the Government consider how they support the maritime industry and whether that should be through a single Minister or improved co-ordination. Either approach has advantages. The maritime industry is looking for a stronger, clearer lead on these issues.

David Taylor: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was at the end of his list, but I would like him to incorporate the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which has a distinct and significant interest in the recycling and breaking of ships at the end of their lives. The improved environmental legislation that gets rid of single-hull ships will inevitably lead to more breaking. It must not happen on south Asian beaches where environmental standards are low.

Mr. Hoban: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. In the alphabet soup of ministerial responsibilities, DEFRA plays an important role. It has launched consultation on the draft Marine Bill, which is perhaps not as broad as its title would suggest. A range of people are interested.

The breaking-up of ships has environmental consequences. There was a debate in the previous Parliament when one such ship was going to be broken up in Hartlepool, when Peter Mandelson was the Member of Parliament. There was some debate about whether that should happen here or overseas.

I want to go back to the maritime industrial strategy, the importance of shipbuilding and the MOD as the industry's principal customer. VT Group is based in Portsmouth, with a modern dockyard facility that has recently opened in a transfer of facilities from Woolston. Alongside that is the maintenance system co-owned by VT Group and BAE Systems.

As a constituency MP considering issues about the future of VT Group and the repair and maintenance facility in the dockyard, I have always been conscious of the uneven nature of the work load, which can lead to feast or famine. For example, there might be an order for a number of warships and VT Group will have to gear up for that, as it will have to for the carrier vessel future, or CVF. There will also be times when VT Group will have to lay off employees because of a dip in the work load from the MOD. At the moment, VT Group is fortunate as not only does it have work on the Type 45 destroyer, but it has secured a successful export contract for ships. That should maintain the work load until the CVF comes on stream, when the group will need to recruit more staff to cope with that bulge in the work load.

The question arises of what will happen after CVF. What plans do the MOD have to ensure that work goes into UK dockyards, and how does that match our defence needs? If we are to have a viable warship building industry in the UK, we need some certainty about future work loads to ensure that the principal warship builders have some knowledge of what capacity will be required. That requires a closer working relationship between the industry and the MOD, which raises the question of value for money for taxpayers. How will we ensure that we have some competition for warship and shipbuilding while ensuring that the industry has some certainty? The MOD is going down the route of through-life maintenance contracts, so it is interested when procuring warships not only in the initial build costs but in how much it will cost to maintain those warships. That requires some transfer risk to the shipbuilding businesses.

When considering such partnering arrangements, which VT Group is committed to, we should manage to balance the respective interests of the taxpayer and the warship building industry to produce a satisfactory outcome that ensures stability of employment and maintenance of capacity along with a good deal for the taxpayer. Those are some of the important issues that affect my constituency. I appreciate that this is outside the scope of the Minister's responsibilities, but I hope that his opposite numbers in the MOD will read these remarks and think about how best to accommodate the conflicting pressures on the warship industry in the UK.

10.10 am

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) on obtaining the debate. She made a very good case. She spoke of the proud record of the Government, but she also made a powerful case for the need further to improve the prospects of seafarers. I come from Plymouth, another proud naval constituency, and I well remember marching up and down Fore street in Saltash with the district National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers officer, Baz Gregory, when I stood—I was unsuccessful at the time—as a candidate in South-East Cornwall in the 1990s. At that time, people were fearful as to whether there was a future for UK seafarers at all. It is a mark of where we have got to today that we are standing up and fighting for the right conditions for those seafarers.

In addition to declaring my interest in that I come from a seafaring constituency, I declare a non-pecuniary interest as a vice-president of the Society of Maritime Industries. The United Kingdom, and in particular London, is a world centre for maritime activities, and to maintain that position we need to find ways to value seafarers. That is important in its own right but also because we need to recognise the strong links between offshore work and the experience that people gain as seafarers, and the significant gaps in the important onshore work and the need to recruit people there. If we do not start valuing people when they are young and go to sea and gain that experience, it becomes much more difficult to look forward.

Following on from the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban), I declare not exactly an interest but an experience with the Defence Committee. I reiterate what he said about the need to try to get these things right for the future of British shipbuilding. A huge programme of shipbuilding, the biggest for two generations, was laid out as part of the defence industrial strategy last December. That will be followed through with the marine industrial strategy. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Minister can comment on what part he and his Department might play in seeing that through. Important skills issues relating not only to the onshore infrastructure, which supports the maritime industry, but to the shipbuilding industry need to be addressed. As I understand it, the marine industrial strategy is setting out to address how best we can sustain critical industrial skills and technologies that we need for the future, while delivering improved performance quality and competitiveness.

I said that I came from a well known naval constituency. The region has a terrifically long coastline—one third of the coastline of England. It is no surprise that the marine and maritime sectors have been identified as priorities in respect of economic development by our regional development agency. We have growth in that sector, mainly deriving from leisure, marine and defence-related activities and important centres at Falmouth, Plymouth and Poole. I want to consider the need to get the wider maritime industry on board in valuing not only seafarers, but the work that many seafarers go on to do after their seafaring career, which my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran mentioned.

I draw to the Minister's attention the work of Marine South West, which has emerged from the work of the regional development agency, and the network of skills centres that it is developing as a potential model and way forward. The skills centres are based on the three communities that I mentioned. They are also supported by IT networks. A great deal of work has been done with the marine and maritime industry to identify the top 10 skills list for onshore jobs. The skills include those relating to business management, IT, electronic engineering, mechanical engineering, welding and fabrication, painting and finishing, composites, carpentry and so on.

That work is aimed at ensuring that there is a bridge to enable people in the general marine and maritime industries to find careers and a way forward. That is important to the case that my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran laid out, because if those skills gaps exist, it is exceedingly important that we find ways to assist seafarers. Often when they are younger, their skills are developed and they are valued and rewarded for the work that they do.

I am sure that the Minister appreciates that the marine and maritime industries are high technology-based and that their continued success is based on the application of enterprise and innovation. In January, I was able to secure the Upper Waiting Room for an exhibition on just how high-tech those industries have become. I found the figures quite staggering: for Plymouth alone, we are talking about £1 billion for the marine, maritime and broader marine science sector.

We need to develop programmes across the piece to inspire young people to pursue careers in that rewarding and vital sector. We need to develop employer-led training and skills centres such as those exemplified by Marine South West. I look forward to the Minister's response to the important points that my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran raised. I hope that the Minister will also acknowledge the points that I have made about the way in which the south-west is leading the way on some of these matters.

10.17 am

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): The normal crew assembles for debates on this subject over the years. However, I must apologise because one of our crew is missing: my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Gwyn Prosser) is on parliamentary business abroad. I declare an interest as the chair of the RMT parliamentary group and I refer to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) on securing the debate and on her superb and definitive description of the industry as it stands and the issues facing us. I shall be brief because other hon. Members want to speak. I shall focus on the Race Relations Act 1976 and the minimum wage.

There is an element of déjà-vu because we were in Westminster Hall three years ago having the same debate and things do not seem to have moved on. In 2003, the Home Office made it clear that it did not believe that the shipping industry should be excluded from race relations legislation. It then started the consultation about how to bring the shipping industry within that legislation. We went through that debate and the Government decided that they would introduce amendments to the legislation.

I was cheered and enthused that at long last the Government were addressing this sector of British life, which had been excluded from the basic laws of civilised society as we know it. Then, the Government created the bizarre situation in which discrimination on the basis of ethnicity was outlawed, but discrimination could continue on the ground of nationality. Employers could pay one worker less than another simply because of the country from which they came. That is outrageous in any civilised society.

We went on with the debate, however, and I think that it was in this room that the statutory instrument was considered. I attended the Committee considering it. I was not a member of the Committee, but I exercised my right to speak. One thing that convinced hon. Members to support the amendment allowing discrimination on the ground of nationality to continue was the Minister's statement, both in that Committee and in the Adjournment debate, that hon. Members need have no fear because the minimum wage would apply to anyone serving on a British ship in UK waters. I did not go away happy, but I thought that at least we had secured some commitment from the Government. Within months, we discovered that "territorial waters" was not the definition, but "internal waters". I sail on the Norfolk broads; I have an old, battered wooden boat and I am not a very good sailor. When I sail, people get off the water if they see me coming. If I employed someone on that boat in Norfolk waters, they would get the minimum wage. If I sailed outside Great Yarmouth harbour, I doubt that they would because we would have gone outside internal waters. No one knew what internal waters meant. I had never heard the definition before, and we had to scurry for lawyers to get that definition and to find out where the idea had come from.

People are still being discriminated against in the industry because they are not achieving the minimum wage, and it is happening on ferry service after ferry service: Larne to Troon and Cairnryan, Mostyn to Dublin, Rosslare to Cherbourg, Fleetwood to Dublin and Belfast and Liverpool to Dublin. British seafarers are being replaced by Spanish, Filipinos and others who are paid less and work in poorer conditions. That is exploitation by any standard. No one is arguing for those people to lose their jobs, but if they have jobs they should be paid the same rate as anyone else. Why should one person be paid less than and work in different conditions from others when they are doing the same job within our own territorial waters? That is a scandal.

The situation is the same on the Hull to Zeebrugge route run by P&O North Sea Ferries, which uses British, Portuguese and Filipino workers, with the Filipinos being exploited the most. Companies are allowed to pay disgraceful wages. Ramsay Shipping, which trades between the UK and Ireland and the UK and Scandinavia, is paying Filipino seafarers £456 a month. Union Transport—there is an ironic name if ever there was one—is paying east European seafarers £856 a month. It trades between the Isle of Man and Britain, and the Isle of Man and Ireland.

We have raised this matter time and time again. The National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers issued a press release 18 months ago regarding a company called Lapthorn, which is paying people below the minimum wage. Our information at the moment is that that continues to be the practice. Workers are being exploited within sight of the British coast as a result of our failure to plug the gap in race relations legislation. I believe that this is a disgrace, for a Labour Government in particular, and for a civilised society.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran said, the European Union has introduced directives that ensure that the Government must comply so that EU workers, at least, receive the same treatment as UK seafarers. My hon. Friend the Minister gave us a commitment in February 2005 that amendments to the legislation would be brought forward, but by the end of 2005 we had not seen any. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that we get Government action speedily. Three years on from the previous Adjournment debate on the issue and two years on from the statutory instrument Committee we are still in a situation where workers are being exploited, and where employers are exploiting a loophole in the law. It is a moral responsibility on this Government to act, and act now.

Mrs. Linda Riordan (Halifax) (Lab): I, too, add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) on securing this important debate. I welcome the opportunity to talk about recent disputes with Irish Ferries at the end of 2005, which my hon. Friend mentioned.

The dispute is now over, but it raises important questions regarding UK shipping and the future of UK and Irish ferries. The Irish Ferries dispute was one of the most serious industrial disputes in Ireland's history and it was sparked by the proposed replacement of 543 Irish seafarers by eastern European seafarers on rates of pay well below those of the minimum wage.

Irish Ferries runs ships between Britain and Ireland and the company sought to dismiss its existing Irish sailors and replace them with workers from Latvia and Estonia on lower rates of pay and longer hours. Irish Ferries adopted crude tactics by smuggling private security guards on board the ships to make sure that the handover to the new cheaper crew went smoothly. That further inflamed the dispute with a stand-off developing on the Isle of Irishmore ship in Pembroke and the Ulysses in Holyhead.

On both those ships seafarers occupied the vessels in protest and refused to leave the berth with a new crew unfamiliar with the operation of the ship. The port authorities also refused to grant the International Transport Workers Federation inspectors access to the ships' crews to check on their welfare, which was in breach of International Labour Organisation convention 147. In December last year, the Irish Congress of Trade Unions co-ordinated a day of action with workers across Ireland stopping work in support of the existing Irish Ferries seafarers. The dispute resulted in the cancellation of Ireland's social partnership negotiations, although regrettably the European shipowners organisation could not bring itself to condemn the actions of Irish Ferries despite concerns being raised in the European Parliament.

In the 21st century the people of Ireland could not comprehend how it was possible for shipowners forcibly to dismiss Irish seafarers and replace them with seafarers from eastern Europe on rates of pay equivalent to half the Irish minimum wage, when at the time the minimum wage was only £5.20 per hour. Unfortunately, in the shipping industry it seems that a different set of rules apply. The Irish Government condemned the actions of Irish Ferries, but stated that the transfer of the flag from Ireland to Cyprus meant that they were powerless to act. The Cyprus flag is one of the countries that have been deemed by the International Transport Workers Federation to be a flag of convenience. Flags of convenience are often utilised by shipping companies as safety and working conditions are not enforced effectively.

In the end, the settlement brokered through the Irish courts resulted in the replacement of significant numbers of Irish seafarers with cheaper labour from Eastern Europe. Thanks to the heroic actions of a group of seafarers the rates of pay were not below the minimum wage but the company has none the less succeeded in lowering standards in the Irish sea sector.

[Mrs. Linda Riordan]

Standards around the UK coast have declined in the past few years, but there are still shipping companies that employ UK seafarers, both as ratings and officers. For example one of Irish Ferries' principal competitors, the Swedish company Stena Line, operates ferry services around the UK, including in the Irish sea, and employs seafaring officers and crew on UK rates of pay. In addition, UK seafarers are employed by P&O Irish Sea Ferries although the company also employs other nationalities. Norse Irish also employs UK and other foreign national sailors.

Irish Ferries threatened to start a race to the very bottom and its actions endangered the future of British and Irish seafarers in the ferry sector. The ferry sector is now one of the few remaining areas of employment for UK seafaring ratings. During the dispute, the RMT wrote to the Minister responsible for shipping, asking him to convene early discussions with Irish Government counterparts to implement measures to tackle awful practices in the shipping industry.

Acceptable social standards have to be enforced on all ships trading between UK and Irish ports, irrespective of the flag of the vessel. The UK Government have previously gone on record as supporting the EU directive. This directive sought to ensure that the pay and conditions of seafarers on regular passenger and ferry services trading between the UK and other parts of the European Union were in line with seafarers of the member state with the closest connection to the ferry or passenger service. It was not possible to get the support of all member states to pass this legislation, but given the increasing frequency of the displacement of UK and Irish seafarers, similar legislation will undoubtedly be debated again. I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend the Minister can advise me that the Government still support the principles and measures as outlined in this directive.

We must take action to safeguard the standards of the UK flag and we must also work with other EU member states to ensure that acceptable social standards are enforced on all ships trading around the UK. I hope that the Minister will agree to engage constructively with members of the RMT parliamentary group, so that we can work towards an acceptable solution.

10.30 am

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) on securing the debate, because it is an important subject. I welcome her to the select band of people who take an interest in shipping matters from a constituency point of view. I have taken an interest in them from an early stage of my parliamentary career, and I welcome her to the club.

The hon. Lady presented her arguments in a measured but forceful manner. The only part of her analysis with which I could take issue was her fondness for Caledonian MacBrayne. At some other time and place, we can discuss the impact of Caledonian MacBrayne, and David MacBrayne before it, on the development of highlands and islands communities. I fear that if we were to do so today, Mr. Gale, you would rightly rule us out of order.

It is tempting to speak of the shipping industry, but in truth there are a number of different industries. One remarkable feature of the shipping industry is its global nature. The simple commercial reality is that if we do not operate a commercial regime that allows or encourages people to flag, operate and trade here, plenty of other countries will. It means that when the Government construct something such as the tonnage tax, which I have supported not uncritically, they must perform a delicate balancing act. I do not think that they have got the balance right, but I recognise the need for it.

It is a different situation from that outlined by the hon. Lady, regarding the operation of section 9 of the Race Relations Act 1976, and in particular the exemption of inshore waters from the application of the minimum wage. I can see no excuse for that. It is bizarre and perverse that somebody who drives a bus or a train on dry land is treated differently from somebody who works on a ferry or any other inshore shipping vessel. I cannot understand the logic of that.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) was right about the distinction between discrimination on the basis of nationality as opposed to ethnicity. That distinction would not be tolerated in any other sphere of industry or commerce, and I do not understand why it is tolerated in shipping. My experience is that many things are tolerated in shipping simply because they do not take place on land. In relation to shipping safety standards and practice, if many ships on the high seas were lorries on the road, traffic commissioners would take them off immediately, and next day the story would be on the front page of every tabloid.

I want to pay tribute to some of the organisations that work in shipping. In particular, the National Union of Marine, Aviation and Shipping Transport Officers and the Chamber of Shipping are very good at keeping Members of Parliament informed, and at providing thorough and frequent briefings. As one would expect, they often approach a subject from different angles, but I find the input from both organisations immensely helpful. I shall raise a few points that they have mentioned in their briefings. The first is on the tonnage tax.

The Chamber of Shipping rightly points out that in just over five years, the commercial shipping fleet that is owned and managed in the UK has more than doubled in carrying capacity. The UK flag fleet has more than quadrupled. The chamber makes the point, which I had not heard, that shipping earns £1.2 million an hour for the UK economy. We must understand that whatever romantic notions there may be, we are dealing with a big business.

The chamber also makes one interesting claim that I shall pursue with it and NUMAST in the fullness of time. Its research carried out jointly with NUMAST shows that the total number of junior officers recruited will increase by 19 per cent. over the next three years and continue to increase over the next decade. I hope that they are right, but I am not sure that even an increase of that sort would meet the targets that have been outlined. Further, nothing is said about the position of ratings.

The two organisations also say something more telling: there has been a 9 per cent. decrease in the number of UK deck and engine officers since 1997, and the total number of UK officers is expected to continue to decline in the short term. They say that some of the reasons for that relate to demographics.

What is the appropriate way to administer the tonnage tax? It has been around for several years, and it has proved its worth by bringing shipping under the British flag. However, being under the British flag proves to be of limited value unless it brings with it the application of certain basic standards of labour and safety. The Government must do more. The case has been made, and it is clear that the industry will not apply those standards voluntarily. The Minister must say that the need for a link has been accepted. If he or his Treasury colleagues were prepared to do that, it would move the debate on to the nature of the link, which is where the substantial negotiations remain to take to place.

It is difficult to divorce shipping interests from those of ports. The Government are shortly to commence a consultation on their port strategy. Declaring a constituency interest, I issue to the Government a plea that when they consult they have particular regard to the changing nature of containerised shipping throughout the world. The market model shows that there is an increasing number of big container ships, which to my mind and to the minds of many in the shipping industry means that we are moving towards large container ports—hubs from which smaller ships take the containers on to smaller ports. That is inevitable, and we need at least one such hub in Britain.

I have a constituency interest in that, and so does the hon. Lady, because Hunterston in her constituency has the infrastructure to accommodate such a hub, and it is building up that area of the business. In my case, the natural deep-water port of Scapa Flow is available for development, and there is a great deal of support in Orkney for taking that forward.

Ms Katy Clark: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a strong environmental case for placing ports not only in the south of England, but in other parts of the country? There is a particular need in the north of England and in Scotland for freight not to enter the country through Rotterdam or the south of England, and for it to do so in a way that minimises the road transport of freight.

Mr. Carmichael: The hon. Lady is right. The environmental arguments for putting more freight on to the sea are compelling. With the south of England's substantial amount of freight transport, it is probably the worst place for freight to enter. If UK plc does not get its act together soon, other places will cheerfully take that business, as they have done with other aspects of shipping. I suspect that it will be lost to ports such as Rotterdam, which will mean that the points of entry will be the south coast ports, which will bring no environmental benefit. The opportunities for commercial employment and environmental improvement that would result from placing hubs in constituencies such as mine and the hon. Lady's would be lost.

10.40 am

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) on securing the debate and on a well informed and impassioned speech.

The red ensign now flies over 3 per cent. of the world's merchant shipping, a far cry from the days when we had 40 per cent. of the ships prowling the globe, and when the merchant navy's sister service, the Royal Navy, could maintain a two-power standard. Nevertheless, the merchant fleet is as important as ever to our economy. It has again overtaken aviation to become our third largest export earner, with a turnover of more than £10 billion. More than 95 per cent. of our trade comes from the sea, 67 million people travelled to and from our shores by boat, and Britain has Europe's largest ports industry and the world's most significant maritime hub, with an annual turnover of £37 billion. We must also remember all the ancillary operations, from insurance to marine law, in which Britain is a world leader.

We have had a well informed debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) discussed naval shipbuilding. I shall not follow him down that route and go beyond my brief, but, sadly, it appears that many of the problems that existed 20 years ago when I was a management consultant to several shipbuilders continue to exist.

We no longer face a serious military threat of being cut off by sea from major supplies of crude oil and materials, but in times of crisis there is still an important defence need, as my hon. Friend reminded us, to transport troops and arms to war zones. During the Falklands war, dozens of vessels were requisitioned for service in the south Atlantic. Merchant sailors faced death and injury on behalf of their nation and were rightly rewarded for their gallantry. Looking across a range of such issues, we can see why the decline in the merchant navy in the past 30 years is so serious for British trade.

Mr. Carmichael: Did the hon. Gentleman read the article in the NUMAST Telegraph last year or the year before which made the valid point that we would not be able to raise the Falklands taskforce again in an emergency?

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman anticipates my next point. Today, we would be incapable of fighting an operation such as the Falklands war, at least with the support of British merchant ships. In 1982, 985 ships of more than 500 gross tonnes were owned and registered in the UK. Today, the figure is 260. Worse still, the number of British merchant sailors has fallen by three quarters over that period.

The two Gulf wars have shown that, in such situations, the Government can hire merchant ships from other shipping registers and foreign owners. However, while we might be able to afford to hire ships, the availability of trained and loyal sailors might prove more difficult. Admiral Sir Nicholas Hunt stated at an all-party House of Commons Defence Committee sitting:

> "The crucial weakness is that even if we can get the ships, we have to have the seafarers . . . The kernel of the problem is . . . I am a bit doubtful if you could get the men who were properly qualified."

As the Defence Committee said many years ago, there are some things that money cannot buy, and that is certainly true in the case of pride, bravery and courage.

I have some sympathy with the points made by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) about seafarers, specifically in UK territorial waters. As it is a complicated matter and one on which my party is conducting a large policy process, I cannot give an Opposition view on it, apart from saying that I heard his points and have some sympathy with them.

I salute the Government's efforts, through the introduction of the tonnage tax, to rebuild our merchant marine sector after many generations of decline, and their efforts to ensure a stable and competitive environment for the industry. The hon. Member for North Ayrshire and Arran referred several times to "Charting a New Course". Some, but not all, of its recommendations have been adopted, and it would be interesting to hear from the Minister what the timetable is for delivery on the remaining recommendations.

UK-owned has shipping increased its tonnage by 137 per cent. since 2000, and the tonnage of the fleet flying the red ensign has increased by 325 per cent. during the same period. There are nearly 600 new officer cadets each year, one third more than before the tonnage tax was introduced. I am indebted to the General Council of British Shipping and NUMAST for that briefing. However, while that improvement is welcome, it does not go nearly far enough. Even with the increase in cadets being trained, and even with 90 per cent. of those cadets finding jobs in the UK fleet, as the joint study by the Chamber of Shipping and NUMAST showed, the sad fact is that the number of new officers each year is barely half the number needed merely to stand still, largely because the age profile of existing officers is so far to the right. At current trends, the number of UK officers will fall by almost half in the next 15 years.

As the hon. Lady said, the position with ratings is much worse. Unless the trend is reversed speedily, there is a severe danger of the sector going back into decline. International Financial Services, London has warned that the vast contributions made by British shipping and associated maritime services to the Exchequer could be in jeopardy.

I paid tribute to the Government's efforts on the tonnage tax, but their record on the ports sector has been most disappointing. Severe delays in decisions about port development are a threat not just to the shipping industry but, arguably, to the wider economy. The Dibden bay farrago—seven years of arguing, £45 million into the pockets of lawyers, and at the end of it only a firm "No"—seriously undermined confidence in the whole system. That confidence can be restored only by Government action to ensure that timely decisions are made about the development of ports, which brings me to an obvious question: when will the strategy that we have heard so much about be published? We need to take a wider look at how the transport strategy—road, rail and so on—will serve the infrastructure of existing and planned port developments. To take one example at random, Crossrail, which is going through the House with the support of all parties, and rightly so, as currently planned would mess up the freight links to Felixstowe.

On a more detailed point, may I tease the Minister once again about the Harbours Bill? The industry and my party want that small and sensible measure, and the Government have said that they want it. Will he have a word with his right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and get us a Second Reading debate of an hour or two, which is a reasonable requirement for any Bill? There have been plenty of slots when it could have been fitted in.

The maritime sector in this country has been unwell for decades and is in a fragile state. There is a modest recovery at present, but we must be careful not to make the industry reconsider its position in this country. The Chamber of Shipping stated:

> "The industry is perhaps the most global and most easily relocated of all industries. Any disturbance of the current successful climate in the UK will put the recovery at serious risk."

We must consider either a clearer employment link to the tonnage tax, or other employment-related measures. The unions and the Transport Committee have called for the former, and the General Council of British Shipping has some ideas on the latter. As so much of our maritime future lies in being able to resuscitate the skills sector of the industry, it is important that we consider every possibility and take whatever decision needs to be taken soon.

In summary, I hope that the Minister will give the timetable for delivery of the remaining recommendations in "Charting a New Course". I hope that we will hear something about publication of the shipping taskforce's report, to which the hon. Lady referred, on possible links between employment and the tonnage tax, and I should like to know when the ports policy will be published. Finally, can we have a commitment on that small measure that has been around for a long time, the Harbours Bill?

I am pleased to have had an opportunity to speak in the debate on this great industry.

10.49 am

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) on securing this debate and on joining the small, select band of MPs who take maritime issues seriously. I wish that that band was much larger, and that we had these debates more often. Since I have been in my post, I can recollect offhand only one occasion on which I was asked a question on maritime matters at first order questions. That really is not good enough; the House should take more interest in such an important industry.

Several hon. Members have described the importance of the industry, which has earnings of more than £10 billion a year, and export earnings of £7 billion a year. As the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) said, it has overtaken aviation to become the third largest export earner for our country's economy. It is a very important industry, and it has strategic importance, too: 95 per cent. of goods that come into and out of the country are still carried by sea. It is a vital industry. Nor is it restricted to the sea; the industry extends into land—into the financial and insurance sectors, and into the ports. Ports can be a tool for regeneration for our communities and are themselves a key part of the economy.

A small part of the east Kent mafia is here today. Its members include the hon. Member for Canterbury and I, as well as you, Mr. Gale. We know that the biggest employer in Kent is not Pfizer, the pharmaceutical company, as everybody usually says, but the port of Dover, if one takes on board both direct and indirect employment. In addition, there are ports at Sheppey; there are the Medway ports; and there are smaller ports at Ramsgate, Broadstairs, and Margate, which is in your constituency, Mr. Gale. There is also the leisure boating industry and the under-12m fishing fleet around Kent. In fact, in counties such as Kent, maritime issues are the most important part of the economy. Essentially, the questions that my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran put to me were how we maintain that, and build on it to encourage further employment.

My hon. Friend has painted a slightly pessimistic picture of employment in the industry. It is not as I would like it to be, and there are not enough UK seafarers working yet, but the situation is improving. There were 896 UK officers employed on tonnage tax boats when the tonnage tax started in 2000–01, and there are now 2,888. The number of ratings has increased from 449 to 1,460. One could argue that that is because far more boats have come under the tonnage tax over that period. However, although between 1997 and 2001 the number of UK active seafarers fell from 30,000 to 25,000, that fall has been reversed; by 2004 there were 29,000 UK active seafarers, and 26,500 of those are at sea, so the situation is not quite as bleak as my hon. Friend describes it.

As was put fairly by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), the dilemma that I face is that of striking a balance. My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Riordan) described what is, in a sense, an Irish problem. She talked about the situation as regards Irish Ferries and about what happened when Irish Ferries flagged out. Under those circumstances, a new crew could be brought on board who would work for much less than Irish citizens would. The National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers wrote to me, asking me to intervene, and the Irish Shipping Minister had many conversations with me during that crisis; he was a frequent telephone caller to my office, asking for advice and support. That crisis highlighted what happens when regulations that shipowners do not like are put in place. Shipping is an international business and, at the stroke of a pen, people can move their ships under another flag and take on a new set of lesser restrictions, so there is a balancing act to perform.

I have heard and understand the arguments advanced by the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Officers and the National Union of Marine, Aviation and Shipping Transport Officers. We have not yet made our decisions on the output of the shipping taskforce; those announcements will have to wait until after purdah, but it will not be long before we announce what we will go for. I ask colleagues on both sides of the Chamber for a little sympathy for the fact that I have a narrow line to walk between wanting to do something that will stimulate employment and bring UK seafarers on to boats, and wanting to bring ships under the red ensign. Let us not forget that people do not have to be under the red ensign to benefit from tonnage tax; likewise, people under the red ensign do not have to be within the tonnage tax regime. I want ships to be under the red ensign, and I want UK seafarers on them. I have to try to find a way to maximise that potential, but without driving shipowners to take their ships away from the red ensign and the tonnage tax, and to put them instead under other flags, and flags of convenience.

I remind the House that there are many flags of convenience, and that there are also numerous variants on the tonnage tax now. We may have invented it, but other countries came along afterwards and thought, "That was a jolly good wheeze that the Brits came up with; we'll do the same thing." Shipowners have choices, and we have to find a way of navigating through those choices.

At the end of the day, one thing that will help us to bring UK seafarers back to the sea is the training regime that we offer. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy). Our seafarers will never be as cheap as other countries' seafarers, so they have to be better—better trained, better qualified, and providing better value for money. We have to find a way of doing that. Could the training regime that we put in place and the money that we provide for training be tools that we use to encourage shipowners to stay under the red ensign, to stay with tonnage tax, and to use UK seafarers, to offset any extra costs of employing UK seafarers that they might incur? Hon. Members will have to wait until our announcements to find out, but that certainly is one thing that we will have to consider.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), who made a powerful case about the Race Relations Act 1976, will also have to wait. I do not recollect making a commitment to sort the matter out by the end of 2005; I made a commitment to him to bring the Act within EU law.

John McDonnell: The commitment was about the implementation of the EU directive within that time.

Dr. Ladyman: I remain committed to bringing the 1976 Act within EU law; it is the date by which my hon. Friend thinks that I promised to do it that I am slightly in doubt about. That is an issue that we need to continue to work on.

I shall deal with one or two other points raised. We cannot start the ports policy review until the last of the outstanding planning decisions that we have a mind to approve—that on London Gateway—is taken. That is because until we know whether we are granting that planning permission or not, we do not know what our existing port capacity is. How can we come up with a strategy for the country unless we know what our existing port capacity is, and is projected to be? Also, legal constraints would come into play if we started the ports policy review while there was a high-profile, outstanding planning issue to be decided. I hope that that matter will be dealt with very shortly; then we can move on and start the ports policy review, which, as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland said, is vital, and which it is important that we get on with. Unfortunately, the Scottish Parliament has made a universal declaration of independence on the ports policy review and will conduct its own parallel review of its ports strategy, so to what extent the strategy for England and Wales—

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. We now move to the next debate.

Accommodation Addresses

11 am

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): It will come as no surprise to any of us that trading standards authorities and other agencies receive many complaints from the victims of mail scams. The conmen involved, who often use accommodation addresses provided by so-called mailing houses, are extremely difficult to trace as they use those addresses for a short period only—[Interruption.]

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. Will those leaving the Chamber do so quietly, please?

Mr. Truswell: I suspect that, like me and most other citizens of this country, the Minister receives his fair share of dubious mail shots, which are a national problem. Rogue businesses buy or rent addresses that sound legitimate or prestigious and use them as part of a scam. They have the mail redirected to them or collect it personally. People who send money to those addresses probably do not realise that they are merely a front—in many cases, a shoe box-sized locker or a pigeon hole in a very small office.

Calculating the numbers of accommodation address providers or the companies using them is difficult, as they rapidly come and go. They exist to some degree in most local authority areas, but there is no way of keeping track of them. Although a minority of accommodation address providers make reasonable inquiries of their customers, far too many are happy to accept cash payments and take mobile phone numbers as the only contact detail.

I appreciate that tackling the abuse of accommodation addresses is not a panacea for dealing with mail scams, many of which originate abroad. However, experience shows that many of the victims are initially identified by fraudsters operating through scams in the UK. Once that happens, they tend to be targeted by all and sundry. A perfect and tragic example in my constituency was that of an older person who had lost a total of £25,000 on mailing scams. He suffers from dementia. Carers alerted west Yorkshire trading standards officers, who found eight plastic carrier bags full of further mail requesting money for dubious lotteries and competitions and various other scams. According to figures I was given recently, the West Yorkshire Trading Standards Service has received more than 200 complaints in the past year, but it is believed that that is the tip of the iceberg.

I should make it clear that the majority of mailing houses that provide accommodation addresses operate within the law. Sadly, however, some less reputable businesses use those facilities to set up dubious home-working scams, operate prize draws and lotteries, offer mail order goods that never arrive and generally rip off the public. We know from many media stories how wide the problem is.

Unfortunately, the people who provide the accommodation addresses all too often operate on a "no questions asked" basis and keep insufficient or no records on those who use the addresses. Thus, those users are virtually anonymous. All too often, the investigating police and trading standards officers, such as those in my area of west Yorkshire, visit the accommodation addresses only to find that there are no proper details on the individuals who use them.

There is a voluntary code of conduct, but many accommodation address providers do not adhere to it; I shall come to that issue shortly. West Yorkshire trading standards officers have told me how frustrating it is to go to such providers and ask them to stop providing facilities for obvious and palpable scams, only for the operators to shrug their shoulders and say, "Well, we are not breaking any laws."

Enforcement action needs to go hand in hand with the public awareness and education that will help people not to be victims in the first place. Many of us operate under the simple rule that if something looks too good to be true, it probably is.

I could cite many examples to demonstrate the sort of scams that use accommodation addresses; I am sure that, given his position, my hon. Friend the Minister is aware of even more. One example that particularly struck me was the company Select Publications, not because of the size of individual losses but because of the scale of its operation. The company was registered with Companies House, using a mailing address in Westminster as its registered office. When it was finally brought to the courts, the two people running it were found guilty of deception and sentenced to three and a half years' and two years' imprisonment respectively.

As a result of the company's efforts to cover its tracks, the investigation required a huge amount of work by police and trading standards officers. They were not helped by the fact that the accommodation address providers had kept no records that allowed them to trace the individuals; that is one reason why I have cited this example. It took two years to get the defendants to court, and it is thought that they ripped off about 16,000 consumers.

The company used multiple addresses around the UK, including one on the Edgware road, to disguise its location. It advertised in local newspapers, on jobs websites and in Exchange and Mart, offering home-working opportunities stuffing envelopes. It also offered a home-working advice line, an undeclared premium-rate phone line, that cost people about £20 for a 10-minute call. To obtain the jobs stuffing envelopes, the victims, as I shall call them, had to pay a £35 administration fee and often received nothing in return.

Those who got envelopes never received any pay—surprise, surprise—and were subsequently bombarded with mail shots from further businesses, all owned by the principals of the original company, Select, who used different addresses to disguise that fact and start the process all over again.

Another company registered with Companies House used an accommodation address in Islington as its registered office. In the run-up to Christmas, the company placed adverts for cut-price goods, including TVs, Playstations and Gameboys, in three national newspapers, to exploit the festive season and the wish of parents to gratify the demands of their young ones. The company took upwards of £150,000 in debit and credit card receipts before the directors fled their homes, no doubt having ruined the Christmases of many people.

The directors had also registered another company at a separate address after setting up a website that offered the same goods, but failed to deliver any. The investigation uncovered hundreds of consumers who had paid by debit card; on average, they had lost £200 each. Again, when trading standards officers approached the accommodation address providers, they were given no information about the individuals concerned. That made the investigation difficult.

I could go on and on. Another company carried out removals on behalf of customers and sold the householders' furniture and other valuable items. Again, it used a mailing address as a front so that customers were unable to trace it. An accommodation address was also used as a front for a bogus bank that inveigled two American banks into clearing two cheques for several hundred thousand dollars each. The examples go on and on.

Prestigious accommodation addresses are often used to enhance the image of a company that operates by mail. For example, companies purporting to sell medically related goods may use a Harley street address that turns out to be nothing more than an accommodation address used by hundreds of different businesses. One such company supplied pills for prostate problems, having made a string of unsubstantiated claims about their ability to cure all sorts of ailments. Another trader used a Regent street address to sell fake Viagra pills, which were ineffective and potentially dangerous. Again, that trader was very difficult to trace.

An investment scam using a Bond street address—I am citing scams that have used prestigious addresses—conned investors out of £6 million. The company, which was actually based in Spain, claimed that it would buy art works on behalf of investors and promised high returns each year. The idea was that the money would be used to purchase art works that would be rented to businesses for display—of course, there were no business customers and no art works. The Department of Trade and Industry, the Minister's Department, eventually petitioned for it to be wound up.

Another company charged people up to £4,000 to relocate abroad and find work there. That company is one of a series fronted by the same person, who tends to operate from smart London addresses such as Pall Mall—again, they are just accommodation addresses.

The scale of the problem was demonstrated by a project carried out by trading standards officers in Islington, Hackney, Westminster, Kensington and Chelsea, Camden and Tower Hamlets. Across the six boroughs, 27 operators out of many hundreds were approached, and 24 agreed to answer questions. Even with a relatively small sample, the number of businesses registered with those operators was nearly 6,500. Less than half of those responding asked their customers for any proof of identity, or kept details of the mail that they sent on, and only five obtained signatures for that mail.

The main concern that the survey highlighted was that large numbers of businesses were registered at the addresses and few operators checked the identity of their customers. Clearly, the lack of information being kept by the operators makes tracing the perpetrators of criminal businesses very difficult; in most cases, it was impossible. That is the crux of the problem. Often by the time that investigations have rolled into action, the fraudulent trader has simply disappeared into the ether.

Given the scale and range of scams that use accommodation addresses, and the number of mailing houses providing the service, what is the current legal position? I am sure that the Minister will want to cover that in his reply. It seems that there is little to protect the consumer. Statutory control of accommodation addresses used to be included in the Official Secrets Act 1920, section 5 of which required each operator of such an address to register with the police and to keep a book with the name and address of every person who requested mail to be forwarded on, the type of mail forwarded, the postmark and, if an item was delivered personally, a signature. It must be said that in practice few police forces actively enforced that legislation, and it was outdated and ineffective. Nevertheless, it was on the statute book until the Postal Services Act 2000 removed that control.

While trading standards officers have powers to require information from an operator, including the production of records where there is prima facie evidence of an offence, that does not address the issues that I have tried to describe. The information obtained cannot, under the Enterprise Act 2002, be used for consumers to pursue a claim against a fraudulent business. As I have stressed throughout my contribution, there is no requirement to keep records. As a result, the information is insufficient or non-existent. There is no requirement whatsoever to carry out checks on the information recorded, so in cases of fraud, when the information is examined, it is invariably inaccurate, bogus or almost non-existent.

In the absence of a registration scheme with teeth, tracing the activities of accommodation address users may be extremely difficult for the authorities—trading standards and the police—and impossible for consumers. I am sure that the Minister will say that voluntary regulation has been tried, but I hope that he will accept that it has severe limitations.

Some trading standards departments have promoted the so-called MAIL—mailing, accommodation, internet and locations—fair trade scheme, which is completely free of charge for traders, who join it under the aegis of trading standards. It is designed to ensure a co-operative relationship between trading standards and its members. It has the sort of voluntary approach that the Government often encourage. Unfortunately, it does not work very effectively. For example, in the borough of Westminster, which has 200 operators and is perhaps the prime example in the country in this area, only 30 operators were prepared to join the scheme. An attempt by the Trading Standards Institute to roll it out nationally has not proved successful.

In west Yorkshire, my own area, it is difficult to calculate the number of operators, but we know that only two have been prepared to join the voluntary scheme. It comes as no surprise that those who are prepared to join it tend to be those who provide the least source of worry and who operate a reasonable and effective system.

As I hope I have conveyed, there is a problem for which there is no magic solution. Tackling the abuse of accommodation addresses in itself is not a panacea, but much more could be done. I have already made the Minister aware of my concerns, and I look forward to hearing what he has to say.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): This morning, we have been treated to a perfect example of what an MP's job is. My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) has taken on board his constituents' concerns and seen that the problem is not an isolated one. It is not something that just one, two or a few people are affected by, but is symptomatic of something much bigger and wider, not only in his own area but potentially throughout the country. He has brought those concerns to Parliament to try to ensure that the wider problem is addressed through legislation.

My hon. Friend has properly brought the issue to my attention in an Adjournment debate. It is, of course, open to me to do what Ministers usually do in such debates: to read out prepared speeches for 15 minutes and give all sorts of reasons why it might be difficult to do the sort of things that are asked of us. It is probably much better that the Minister should say, "I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friend said, and I give him an assurance that we shall now investigate the matter further. We will try to take what action we can to improve things." That will be the bulk and tenor of my remarks, because my hon. Friend has performed an admirable job in identifying the problem and bringing it to public attention. It is now a matter for Government to examine it carefully and to try to take action.

I shall try to respond to some of the points that my hon. Friend raised. I was grateful to him for the measured way in which he presented them. I thought he could have been a bit more dramatic, in that he could have named some of the dreadful rogue traders and companies that perpetuate such scams.

Mr. Truswell: One of the reasons why it is difficult to give names is because some of my examples are still the subject of investigations, so clearly it would be unwise to do so.

Barry Gardiner: I appreciate that.

My hon. Friend was very measured; he realised that the issue does not have a simplistic solution. Registration in itself might not resolve all the problems. He also alluded to the Enterprise Act 2002. I will try to address that issue in my remarks, along with other ways in which we might tackle the wider problem of such scams.

As my hon. Friend said I might do, I shall set out some of the background to the repeal of section 5 of the Official Secrets Act 1920, which was contained in the Postal Services Act 2000. As he said, a key aspect of the 2000 Act was to create the framework for the introduction of competition within the liberalisation of the UK postal services sector. That was significant in enabling the UK to keep pace with the overall EU movement towards a liberalised postal market. It was also considered that increased competition would bring benefits to UK postal consumers as it would bring them greater choice and keener prices, improve the quality of service, and provide for increased efficiency within Royal Mail as it responded to the pressures of such competition.

When implementing any new legislation it is always a requirement to examine provisions in existing legislation to find whether they may conflict with the framework envisaged by the new legislation, and then to take action to repeal or amend as appropriate. During that exercise, one such item of legislation that was identified as being a possible candidate for review was section 5 of the 1920 Act. As my hon. Friend also suggested, it was considered that its requirements, if enforced, would place unnecessary burdens on postal operators in that competitive, liberalised UK marketplace. As the provision was Home Office legislation, my Department consulted the Home Office on the potential repeal of this section. The Home Office confirmed that it was a redundant provision that it no longer required for its purposes, that the police authorities had not been actively enforcing it, and that it would place unnecessary burdens on postal operators and the police force within the newly envisaged framework. The Home Office therefore suggested that it was content for the repeal to take place.

It should also be noted that the intended purpose of such a provision contained in the Official Secrets Act 1920 would not have been the regulation of accommodation address services in respect of trading standards and consumer protection issues. The Official Secrets Act of that nature was mainly instigated by the requirements of British intelligence agencies, especially at that period when there existed significant national security concerns regarding acts of terrorism and acts to infiltrate and undermine the Government. The purpose of that provision in that context was likely to be to give the police authorities a means to intercept or track mail in order to root out suspected spies or individuals engaged in activities against the interests of national security. Its intended applicability to issues other than that is doubtful. That is further supported by the fact that it dates from a period when there was only one United Kingdom postal operator, and it is doubtful whether there were many businesses providing what is now considered to be an accommodation address service.

Having said that, my Department is sympathetic to the concerns that have been raised about increasing transparency and accountability in respect of businesses and individuals who may be involved in criminal or fraudulent activities to the detriment of consumers, and who may operate some of their correspondence dealings via an accommodation address service, where such services may not hold or make available to the authorities adequate client details.

My officials have advised me that they have not yet been presented with sufficient robust evidence to support those concerns or to suggest that the problem is so widespread that it merits a national solution. However, my hon. Friend has provided a good amount of evidence, and I ask him to come to see me, perhaps with trading standards officers from his area—and officers from other areas, if they have been in contact with them—so that we can establish together exactly what is the calibre of the evidence and make a good case to the Department. Officials should have a sound body of evidence to work on in order to address this problem.

I turn briefly to the Government's approach to consumer protection and scams in general. We remain committed to improving Britain's consumer regime—a regime that protects and empowers consumers, and that is as fair to business as it is to consumers. I am aware of my hon. Friend's keen interest in consumer protection and policy issues, and although I may cover some areas of which he is already aware, I would like to highlight some of the work that the Government already undertake regarding protection for consumers against scams and frauds.

The Government set out how they would achieve their aim of improving the UK consumer regime in their consumer strategy, "A Fair Deal For All—Extending Competitive Markets: Empowered Consumers, Successful Business" which was published last year. The strategy recognised that enforcement needs to be more effective at stopping the rogues—those who deliberately set out to defraud consumers, often targeting the most vulnerable, as my hon. Friend has highlighted in some of the dreadful examples that he has given.

The Government have provided funding to trading standards services to pilot their specialist "scambuster" team initiative; £1.79 million is being made available over two years. Those dedicated teams will work across local authority boundaries, focusing on the hardest to tackle scams that are normally beyond the capacity of an individual local authority to deal with. The firm intention is that they will crack down on the genuine crooks. A further £1.2 million has been made available over two years for trading standards services to set up an intelligence network to help underpin the effectiveness of "scambuster" teams and local trading standards departments. That network will play a part in ensuring that the real rogue traders find it much more difficult to hide and continue their dishonest activities.

My hon. Friend spoke about the Enterprise Act 2002, and I want to make him aware of Government proposals to amend it to make it easier for consumers to get the kind of information that he referred to from trading standards departments so that they can pursue civil cases. Part 9 of the Act relates to the disclosure of certain types of consumer and competition information. Currently under the Act, public authorities such as trading standards departments are unable to disclose information to individual consumers or businesses for the purpose of civil proceedings. That is to protect sensitive competitive and commercial information, and, as such, it is perfectly proper. However, the Government are currently moving to amend the Act to make it easier for consumers to obtain such information from public authorities in order to pursue civil cases, while protecting sensitive competition information. For example, consumers will find it easier to obtain such information in situations where they are the victim of a scam and wish to reclaim money they have lost, wish to seek redress for personal injury arising from a dangerous or defective product, or seek to obtain information such as a trader's name so that they may serve court papers.

Part 9 of the 2002 Act will be amended in the Company Law Reform Bill that is currently passing through the other place. That will be an enabling provision and the definition of the civil proceedings for which disclosure can be made and the types of information will be enacted through secondary legislation, which at present is planned for some time next year. I hope that that gives my hon. Friend an idea of what the Government are doing to improve the regime by which individuals can seek redress and act to prevent fraud.

The EU directive on unfair commercial practices will also help in combating scams. That directive encompasses significant new enforcement provisions that will help trading standards officers and other enforcers take more effective action against scams. Annex I contains specific provisions prohibiting scams where no prize is awarded at all, where false impression is given that those who participate are likely to get a prize, or which require the consumer to incur a cost. The directive also prohibits misleading actions or omissions, which will outlaw many scams, and, as a final catch-all, it introduces an overarching duty on businesses not to treat consumers unfairly.

I do not want to give my hon. Friend the impression that nothing is being done in this area. It is an important area, and much is being done, both at national level through the Enterprise Act 2002 and the Company Law Reform Bill, and at European level. We are trying to address these dreadful practices.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on this debate; it is an exemplary piece of parliamentary activity. I give him a commitment that if he brings that evidence to me and my officials, we will take it forward through my Department, and do our very best, in conjunction with other Departments with an interest in this area, to ensure that these scams are eradicated once and for all.

Health Services (Wiltshire)

2.30 pm

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): This important debate about the crisis facing health provision in Wiltshire is being held against the background of the Secretary of State's visit to the conference that is being held by the Royal College of Nursing. She is trying to explain to those present why she declared on Sunday that we have never had it so good—or words to that effect—that the health service is safe in her hands and that this is the best year ever in its history. I simply say one thing to her and to the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who is answering the debate. Although the Minister looked very fetching in her tracksuit bottoms in a photo opportunity yesterday, we need more than photo opportunities and spin from the Secretary of State. She and the Minister need only come down to Wiltshire to find out about the reality of the health service on the ground.

Incidentally, in that context, I was amazed the other day to hear that the Secretary of State has visited a grand total of 11 national health service institutions in her two years in the post, so it is hardly surprising that she knows precious little about what is happening on the ground.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Did my hon. Friend also hear that the shadow Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), has visited 60 NHS hospitals in that time?

Mr. Gray: My hon. Friend is right. My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire is assiduous in his attention to detail and in visiting institutions, but I am afraid that the Secretary of State is not, and she will have to spend more time on such visits.

The Secretary of State might like to start that process by coming down to Wiltshire, where I will show her a national health service that is not the best that it has ever been, but which is in meltdown. I use that expression with care, because I do not wish to alarm the ill, the infirm or the elderly, but health provision across the board in Wiltshire is in terminal decline, and it is important that we have this debate to bring that to the Government's attention.

The debate has come about because of the consultation paper issued by the Kennet and North Wiltshire primary care trust on the way forward. It discusses how to bridge the trust's £18 million-a-year deficit and the £28 million inherited debt that the Government are also forcing it to pay off. I should say straight away that every facet of the consultation paper is unacceptable. It offers three options, but all three are wholly unacceptable, and I shall return to that in a moment.

First, however, we should examine the consultation itself. If one is holding a consultation with the public, it should surely be possible for them to come back and propose a different option from those laid down in advance by the PCT. It should surely be possible for them to come back and say, "We want our community hospitals to be preserved as a whole." We have seven such hospitals in Wiltshire, and it must surely be possible for the public to come back and say, "We want all seven." At best, the consultation paper—I am referring to option three, for which I hope people will vote—will save two of those seven hospitals, but close five. Option one, which the Government and the PCT prefer, in effect closes all seven.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): My hon. Friend hopes that everybody will vote for option three, but would it not be better if everybody wrote in and said that all three options were unacceptable because they closed hospitals? In my constituency, for example, they will close Devizes community hospital.

Mr. Gray: My right hon. and learned Friend is of course right, and I shall make precisely the same point. We should ignore the tatty paper that the PCT has produced, which offers three equally unacceptable options. Indeed, I shall ask the public to ignore it and to write in to say that we want none of those options. None the less, of the three, number three is the best.

Let me return, however, to the consultation process itself. Mr. Nicholas Gilliard, the PCT's deputy head, and, more recently, Carol Clarke, its chief executive, have had a number of private conversations on the issue. They have made it plain to the editor of the local newspaper and at a meeting with groups of friends of the local hospitals that the PCT is determined that we should go for option one. Indeed, Carol Clarke said that she was the Margaret Thatcher of the national health service locally, so the lady is not for turning. She is determined that we will go for option one and that the PCT will close its community hospitals across the county.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Gray: I will give way in one moment. Irrespective of what one thinks of the substance of the consultation paper, the fact is that full-time employees, or servants of the state, stood up one week after the consultation was issued to say that their strong preference—as Carol Clarke said, the lady is not for turning—is for the worst option, or the meltdown option, and for all our community hospitals to close. The hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) does not have any community hospitals in his area, but I will happily give way to him.

Mr. Wills: Does the hon. Gentleman regard the description of that lady as the Margaret Thatcher of the local NHS as a compliment?

Mr. Gray: I would of course view it as a very strong compliment, although I am not sure that it would necessarily be viewed as much of one in the halls of new Labour, in which that lady presumably seeks to work. The fact, however, is that she is determined to go for the worst option and to close the hospitals, irrespective of what the public might say in response to the consultation. That is what is so disgraceful.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) said, I shall be asking the public in North Wiltshire to write in in their thousands and tens of thousands. I intend to deliver perhaps 100,000 letters, or at least signatures on petitions, to the Government and the PCT. Those people will not be asking for any one of the PCT's wholly unacceptable options, but telling the Government, "We want our community hospitals to be preserved as they are." If the consultation is genuine, and the Government are indeed determined to listen to our constituents, that option would presumably be available to them.

I will shortly have the honour of presenting a petition to the House of Commons. It will contain at least 30,000, and possibly 50,000, signatures, and I suspect that a significant number of others will write in to add their names to it. My suspicion, however, is that the so-called consultation is a sham and that no consultation is going on. The Government, or their puppet the PCT, have decided to cut, cut, cut our community hospitals and, in effect, to close all seven.

Incidentally, before someone turns round and says, "Don't worry. Chippenham's safe", let me say that under option one Chippenham community hospital will be left with only 20 stroke beds, and any vague resemblance to a hospital will be long gone. What is happening to Chippenham community hospital is what has happened to Malmesbury community hospital over the past two or three years—death by a thousand cuts, with the removal of one service after another. That is entirely unacceptable. Our area is predominantly rural, and 2,500 patients a year use our community hospitals. It is entirely unacceptable that those hospitals should be closed and, according to the consultation paper, replaced by what looks like souped-up GP surgeries. We want our community hospitals and we are determined to keep them.

In that context, I was very much encouraged by the consultation paper "Our health, our care, our say", which the Government produced on 31 January, and by what the Secretary of State said in it:

"we are clear that community facilities should not be lost in response to short-term budgetary pressures that are not related to the viability of the community facility itself."

Conservative Members welcomed that statement. There was also a statement to the House of Commons, in which the Secretary of State said that the community hospitals were to be saved, which Conservative Members also very much welcomed. Even then, however, we pressed her a little and, by chance, I happen to have the Hansard extract here. She said:

"I am ensuring that primary care trusts that are considering the closure of community facilities, and particularly community hospitals, review those in the light of the clear strategy that we have spelled out in the White Paper to ensure that they have the facilities that will be needed as more services are moved out of acute hospitals into the community."

Even then, I was not entirely certain that I could believe what I was hearing. I thought, "This is great news. The Secretary of State is on my side. We've won this battle. We're going to save our community hospitals." I therefore leapt to my feet to press her. I asked:

"Will the Secretary of State give some attention to a case in point, my constituency, where community hospitals, particularly Malmesbury, as well as those that serve the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison)—Bradford-on-Avon, Warminster, Westbury, Melksham and Trowbridge—are under threat? Listening to the Secretary of State's statement, I believe that she is beginning to say that we ought to think again about closing those community hospitals."

That was a clear question. I asked whether she meant that she wanted to save those community hospitals. She said:

"Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire ... need to decide whether specific proposals relating to cottage or community hospitals are indeed the answer, or whether those settings represent future paths that need to be extended rather than diminished or closed."—[Official Report, 30 January 2006; Vol. 442, c. 33–34.]

I challenge the Minister to say whether she stands by what the Secretary of State said as recently as 30 January, when she explicitly said that she believed that community hospitals were the way to deliver in Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire—she named the area, and answered my specific questions—or does she stand by any of the three inadequate options offered in the consultation produced by the primary care trust last week? She cannot have it both ways. Either we keep the community hospitals open, which seems to be what the Secretary of State was suggesting, or we allow them to close, which appears to be what the PCT is now asking for.

The crisis in the health service in Wiltshire is not limited to the closure of the community hospitals, although that is its pinnacle. The crisis spreads across almost every aspect of delivery in the area. Only last week, the Royal United hospital in Bath announced that the dreadful shortage of money meant that it would have to sack 300 people and close up to 60 beds. The Great Western hospital in Swindon is inadequate for the numbers going there; there are huge waiting lists for a variety of procedures. Indeed, a constituent of mine, a retired fireman, used his redundancy money to pay for his wife's operation. It was a perfectly routine women's operation but it had to be done privately. That is a disgrace. That is not how we want our national health service to be.

I was interested to note that, in its press notice about the bed closures, the Royal United hospital said that we should not worry and that everything would be all right because it could rely on the community facilities around Wiltshire to cope with the pressure. Little did it know that the PCT would simultaneously be going out of its way to cut and then close the very community facilities upon which the Royal United was relying.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I share the hon. Gentleman's passion for the NHS. However, he will recall that, in the previous Parliament, the House had to vote for a penny on national insurance, which raised about £8 billion for the health service. I assume that he voted against. If he had had his way, what would be the state of the health service in Wiltshire now?

Mr. Gray: I am encouraged to hear that the Liberal Democrats are sticking by their one and only policy, namely a penny on this or a penny on that. It used to be a penny on income tax; it is now a penny on national insurance. They say, "Whatever your problems, when we form a Liberal Democrat Government, we will solve them."

Mr. Ancram: In light of that intervention, will my hon. Friend reflect on the fact that, although spending on the health service has doubled over the past nine years, health provision in Wiltshire has diminished? What does he think a penny on the national health service would achieve?

Mr. Gray: My right hon. and learned Friend makes an extremely good point. Any housewife knows that it is not how much one spends but how one spends it.

The figures for spending in Wiltshire are extremely interesting, and I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend raised the matter. In reply to a recent written question, we were given the spending figures per head for Wiltshire compared to the rest of the nation. In 2004–05, the Government spent £917 per head in Kennet and North Wiltshire. I shall choose a few areas pretty much at random from that answer. I start with Sedgefield, the Prime Minister's constituency, where spending was £1,236 per head. In Derwentside, Durham and Easington, constituencies in the north of England represented by Ministers, spending was £1,200 or more per head.

Why should people represented by Labour Ministers have one third more spent on them than we do in Wiltshire? That is why we have such debts. That is why we have a so-called overspend. It is not overspending—it is underfunding. All we seek in Wiltshire is the delivery of a first-class health service free at the point of delivery. The Government have forced our PCTs to misspend their money in myriad ways and are preventing that from happening.

The crisis in the national health service does not affect only hospitals. We can see all sorts of other symptoms, such as the prescription postcode lottery. For example, a lady constituent of the hon. Member for North Swindon recently lost her battle in the High Court to get Herceptin to treat her breast cancer, although I think that she is to appeal. One of my constituents, a person by the name of Gray, by coincidence, is going through the same battle.

Mr. Wills: On a point of information, my constituent won her case on appeal.

Mr. Gray: I am delighted to hear it, but the fact that someone should have to go the High Court to extract from the Government the drugs that she needs to save her life seems to be indicative of the problem. There is a terrible postcode lottery in a variety of prescription factors.

National health service dentistry in my constituency is virtually non-existent. I recently won a small battle with the Department of Health over a technical detail that allowed an NHS dentist in Chippenham to preserve his livelihood—I shall not delay the House with it—but people in North Wiltshire are extremely lucky to find a proper national health service dentist, and more dentists are pulling out of the NHS as a result of the new contracts.

The ambulance service recently came up with more new Labour reorganisation. The Government love it. When something goes wrong, they do not put it right—they reorganise it. When I was first elected to my constituency about 10 years ago, I visited the Wiltshire health authority. I was told that it was terribly out of date, that it was a county organisation, and that we were going to have the latest thing—the primary care group. Large quantities of money were spent on creating primary care groups—IT costs, redundancies, management consultancy costs and so on. They then changed to primary care trusts, with more IT and consultancy costs and more redundancies. They then amalgamated two of the trusts—those in my constituency and in the constituency of my right hon. and learned Friend. Now they are bringing the PCTs back together into one big unit, which looks for all the world exactly like the old Wiltshire health authority. I have one question. Should we allow Bath at one end, and Swindon at the other, to become part of our PCT?

Mr. Wills: I hope to speak a little more on that subject later. On another point of information, I remind the hon. Gentleman that we had a Conservative Government 10 years ago, so the idea that health service reorganisation is a function of what he called new Labour is wrong as a point of fact.

Mr. Gray: It is not a point of fact. I became a Member of Parliament on 1 May 1997. The hon. Gentleman will recall that the Conservative Government sadly lost power on that day. The reorganisation to which I refer occurred after I attended the Wiltshire health authority as the Member of Parliament under the new Labour Government. The hon. Gentleman is not quite accurate about that.

All those reorganisations cost a fortune. So what happened recently when we had a problem with the ambulance service? The Government did not put it right or sort it out. They decided to move the deckchairs on the Titanic of the ambulance service and amalgamate the Wiltshire ambulance service with the Avon and Gloucestershire services. What did we find then? One of the chairmen of the constituent parts of the new ambulance service resigned because he believed that the inherited debt of the new ambulance trust would be such that it could not deliver a decent ambulance service to the people of Wiltshire. There we have it: an amalgamation, a management change and the inability to deliver a safe ambulance service.

Steve Webb: I heard of that resignation. It was subsequently claimed that the person who resigned applied for the post of chairman of the new service but was turned down. What does the hon. Gentleman think of that?

Mr. Gray: I am not at all certain about the internal politics, but the fact is that he was chairman of one of the three trusts. He may have had a personal motive for resigning, but he nevertheless produced the figures to demonstrate that the new ambulance trust would have a huge deficit. If the hon. Gentleman is claiming that the amalgamation is a good thing and that his constituents would be well served by the new ambulance trust, he will fall by his words when we discover that it is not working. That was an extremely helpful remark. The Liberal Democrats are apparently in favour of the amalgamation and they will fall on the failure of the trust in months to come.

It is always the way: whenever there is a problem, the Government do not mend it, they reorganise it. We have seen huge amounts of management reorganisation over the years. That is where it has gone wrong. I pay tribute to the Government for spending more and more money on the health service, but the service has got worse and worse. I try not to use hyperbole and I do not exaggerate, but it seems to me that in Wiltshire the frail, the elderly and the sick are not getting the kind of health service that Beveridge foresaw for them. That sort of health service no longer exists in North Wiltshire. I believe that we are seeing the terminal decline of the health service. I do not believe that in 10 years' time we will have anything that even vaguely resembles a national health service in Wiltshire. I believe that this uncaring, despised and hated Labour Government are to blame for that failure. [Interruption.] It is not funny, Minister. Do not laugh about it.

2.50 pm

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I start by congratulating my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), on securing this debate on a subject that is of great importance to all our constituents. He deserves our thanks for giving us the opportunity to talk about it. I am particularly glad to have caught your eye, Mr. Gale, as when I looked at the massed ranks of Conservative MPs from Wiltshire opposite—I am pleased to see one Liberal Democrat present—I thought that there would probably be a need for some balance and perspective.

The hon. Member for North Wiltshire did not always succeed in his self-imposed task of avoiding hyperbole. Of course, the NHS can do better—it always can—but it is important to recall the extraordinary progress of the past eight years or so, as I shall do in relation to my constituency.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will clarify a number of points on national issues. I hope that she will find time to pay tribute to the extraordinary work carried out by everybody who works in the health service, such as ancillary staff, nurses, doctors, and admin and clerical staff, all of whom deserve our thanks. I hope that everyone in the Chamber will join me in congratulating them on the extraordinary work that they do on behalf of all our constituents.

I am also sure that the Minister will find time to talk about financing the health service. I note that for all the hon. Gentleman's elaborate critique of the current state of the national health service, he was short of constructive alternatives. I hope that some of his colleagues will come forward with practical proposals on how they would do things differently and better. I also hope that they will pay particular attention to the fact that as a party they are committed to a so-called third fiscal rule, which means that, axiomatically, they would spend less on public services than the Government. I shall be interested to hear how Conservative Members propose to improve the health service with such fiscal constraints.

I want to talk a little about my experiences of the health service in my constituency. I want to make it clear that this is my personal view, and I have not been put up to it by the Whips. I stress that my experience of dealing with the Minister's Department on behalf of my constituents has not always been happy. There is a certain carelessness from time to time, not from the Minister, but from some of her colleagues. I shall long remember the reply to a letter that I wrote on behalf of a constituent who was in severe and acute back pain and wanted to know why the services of her chiropractor could not be provided on the NHS. Two months later, I got a reply from the Minister in question—not the Minister who is present—which went on for three pages extolling the extraordinary progress and investments that the Government have made and about changes to the provision of chiropody on the NHS.

I have spoken in the House before about the disgracefully bureaucratic and sclerotic response of the Minister's Department to an imaginative and innovative proposal to give choice to the users of dementia services and their carers. I am disappointed that the Department did not respond more constructively to an initiative from front-line professionals in Swindon and the surrounding area, which was focused on delivering what the Prime Minister says that he wants.

Having said that, we should look back at how the NHS was in 1997 and consider the progress that has been made. Only the blinkered and the partisan could talk about this subject for nearly 20 minutes without mentioning the dramatic improvements. All the talk about meltdown is ridiculous when one considers the situation nine years ago.

I remember two middle-aged couples coming to see me in my surgery in successive weeks in 1998. They were desperate because they had been told that the husbands would have to wait more than six months for angiograms. They were under great stress because they did not know whether the husbands would need severe heart operations or what the prognoses would be. They had to wait six months because the resources simply were not available. That simply does not happen any more. The average waiting time for an angiogram in the Great Western hospital is three months, and many people are seen far more quickly than that.

In 1997—I am sure that all hon. Members will remember this—the acute hospital serving Wiltshire was the crumbling Princess Margaret hospital in Swindon. There was a £30 million backlog of repairs and no indication from the Conservative Government of where the money to pay for those repairs was to come from. There was only the most idle, footling discussion about replacing the hospital. We now have the brand new Great Western hospital, which is doing a splendid job. Of course, it is not perfect and there is room for improvement, but the comparison with the old Princess Margaret hospital is dramatic. I repeat that only the blinkered and the partisan would deny that.

The old hospital had waiting lists that stretched for months, and sometimes years. Waiting lists of in-patients grew by 40 per cent. in the last two years of the Conservative Government, and patients were being bussed to hospitals as far away as Birmingham and Southampton.

Mr. Ancram: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not want to be unfair. He says that the new hospital in Swindon is the work of the Labour Government. However, I do not think that he was a Member before 1997, because I represented a large part of his constituency then. Before that election, I recall being consulted on where the new hospital should go, by a Conservative Government who were determined to build one. Indeed, the site on which it was to be built was identified at that time. I am sure that he would like to pay tribute in that regard.

Mr. Wills: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but I chose my words carefully. I said that there had been a lot of idle discussion from the Conservative Government: no practical plans were in place. I respect his longevity in the House and his great experience, and I pay tribute to his diligence as a constituency MP—I inherited many of his constituents, so I know that he was a very good constituency MP—but if he looks back at the record, he will see that no practical plans were in place. They were driven through by the Labour Government and were only possible because of their approach from the beginning to the financing of the NHS.

Mr. Gray: Will the hon. Gentleman pay tribute to Baroness Thatcher, who introduced the private finance initiative under which the hospital was built?

Mr. Wills: The hon. Gentleman has already made his views on Baroness Thatcher clear, but she has very little relevance to this debate.

The experience of my constituents in relation to the provision of hospitals under the last Conservative Government was not just that there were no plans in place to replace the Princess Margaret hospital. My hon. Friend the Minister and Opposition Members will remember that for many years Wiltshire and Swindon had a wonderful hospital in the Princess Alexandra RAF hospital in Wroughton, at which roughly one in 10 of my constituents were born. It provided a crucial resource in helping with hospital care in Swindon, and its closure added a 6 per cent. burden overnight to the services that the Princess Margaret hospital had to provide for my constituents in North Swindon.

When the Princess Alexandra hospital closed, as part of a defence review, the Conservative Government gave no concern to health care needs in that area. We can talk about closures and reorganisations, but at least when this Government reorganise health services, it is with the intention of improving health care, although Opposition Members may disagree with us on whether that intention will be realised. The Conservative Government closed a hospital in Swindon for reasons that were nothing to do with health care. The closure was to get them out of a fiscal hole that they had dug by conducting a savage defence review.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman has been very complimentary about me, and he will want to be fair about this. I strongly opposed the closure of the Princess Alexandra hospital, which was also in my constituency, as I thought it was the wrong decision. The idea was to give the facility to the hospital in Gosport, which is now also under threat. Everything that I said then is coming true.

Will the hon. Gentleman remind me whether at that time—before 1997—his party supported PFI as a way of building new hospitals?

Mr. Wills: I am aware that the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposed the closure of the hospital; I think that locally, everybody did. My point was about the approach taken by his Government.

This Government support PFI, and as a result we have been able to build a lot of new hospitals. My basic point about financing the health service is that the Government are committed to provide more funding than the Conservatives would. The onus is on the Conservatives. Rather than whinging and complaining about what the Government are doing to improve the health service, if they have a better set of proposals they should let us hear them. We should not just have the critique, but let us hear what they are going to do, how they will manage it and how they will fund it.

It is not only the hospital service that is improving, and it is improving, whatever Conservative Members might say. We also have an innovative new range of GP services, and I want to talk about one example from my constituency, the Taw Hill surgery. It is an admirable surgery run by a dynamic collection of GPs who constantly look for ways to improve the service that they deliver to their patients. It is interesting what they have been able to introduce because of the funding provided by the Government.

The surgery offers retinal screening for diabetics, which identifies problems and allows for early treatment of the condition, saving many people's eyesight. A carpal tunnel and hernia service has been introduced. That used to be done under general anaesthetic in hospital, but it is now done under local anaesthetic and locally. There is an antenatal 3D ultrasound facility. Laser skin treatments were previously carried out 40 miles away in hospital and are now carried out at the surgery. Those four important services are now offered locally, and that is only possible because of the investment from the Government, which enables innovative, adventurous and forward-looking GPs, like those at the Taw Hill surgery, to deliver better services for their patients.

All that should be welcomed by Conservative Members. Instead of carping and criticising, we ought to celebrate the progress that we have made. Of course, let us look for improvement, but let us not paint a one-sided, whinging picture of what has happened in Wiltshire. Most objective observers agree that the situation is far better than it was. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will say that further improvements are needed, as that is what the Government are determined to deliver.

3.2 pm

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I start from a slightly different perspective. Perhaps I should have a text: "veniuntque abeuntque pueri, sed semper maneo", or "the boys come and go, but I always stay the same". I am perhaps the longest-serving Member for Wiltshire. I first attended Salisbury hospital in 1952 to have my tonsils out when it was a Nissen hut camp outside the city, on the hill. I have long-held and pretty fond memories of the health service.

I should also declare that I am going to be extremely nice about the health service in South Wiltshire, as I shall shortly be testing it myself. I have an operation booked with the excellent national health service to look after my problem. I shall be throwing away my walking stick and leaping around Westminster shortly. Having said that, I am going to take a slightly different approach to the problems. The crisis that we face in Wiltshire is caused by the crisis management of debt and projected debt and by the unclear boundaries between health service provision and social service provision. That, as far as the south of the county is concerned, is the biggest problem.

It is also an issue of accountability. Over the past six months or so, we have seen the closure of the Amblescroft unit for elderly, mentally ill people, the Greencroft centre as a day centre for disturbed people with a wide range of problems, as well as the community nursing plan service and the hospital alternatives team. We have seen the closure of the Shelwork factory run by Action for Blind People and the Shaw Trust centre for people who are visually impaired and disabled. We have seen a lot of such closures.

At the heart of that has been the great distress caused to the people and families involved. A lot of lessons have been learned. When I have raised such issues, I have received nothing but courtesy from Ministers. When I raised the closure of Amblescroft and the Greencroft centre at oral questions on 7 March, the Secretary of State immediately said that she would look at the specific cases. She did, she got back to me and I received a charming letter from the Minister who is with us today, in which she also pursued those points. It all came back to the problems of accountability. The Secretary of State and the Minister both rightly said that a lot of money was being spent and that decision making on individual projects and expenditure must be matters for local decision.

There is a problem. County councillors faced with picking up the bill, as the national health service will not pay for what it previously paid for, are liable to surcharge. They cannot just go on running up debt ad nauseam. They have not only the electors breathing down their back, but the district auditor. That is a problem for them.

The primary care trust, the acute trust and the mental health trust all have executive and non-executive directors. They have to take responsibility as they are remunerated—not very generously, but they are remunerated—but they are blushing violets. It has been with the greatest difficulty that I have persuaded people to realise that a lot of people in the community are appointed by the NHS Appointments Commission to look after the interests of local people. Nobody knows who they are and when things go wrong they keep their heads down. That is wrong.

I have tried to encourage the non-executive directors of our local health trusts in Salisbury and South Wiltshire to put their heads above the parapet and to explain what is going on. I challenged one of them, who I know very well, and said, "You know what is going on. Surely you can come out and say that when Amblescroft closes no one will be out on the street, because you will have to pick up the pieces." The reply was "Oh no, we have been told not to say anything, because that would indicate liability. We have been instructed to say nothing to anybody." That is a shame, as it inhibits accountability. It is wrong, and it should not happen.

When we consider what has been going wrong in Salisbury, we should remember that a tremendous amount has been going right in South Wiltshire. The health service is in good heart. We have moved on from the Nissen hut era, I am delighted to say. We have been through a number of different sites and have seen rationalisation and massive delay. The one thing that has characterised the health service in South Wiltshire has been change after change. It has normally been a question of administrative change and financial procedures. Often, clinical procedures and policies for the treatment of people have changed. Occasionally, as in the crisis of the past few months, we have seen the chief executive of our primary care trust—an excellent public servant—trying to persuade us that the problem is solved because they have found a new and clinically better way to treat people that, surprise surprise, will cost less in the long run.

That does not help the people who write to their Members of Parliament in terms such as this:

"I am aware that you have been involved in trying to resolve the issues of care funding . . . My mother was resident"

at Amblescroft

"until she unfortunately died . . . She was one of the twelve people earmarked as requiring just 'social care' and as such would potentially have received no direct funding for her nursing care if she had been moved to a nursing home as was being proposed. When I point out that she was epileptic, doubly incontinent, bed ridden, had high blood pressure, high cholesterol and enlarged blood vessels in her brain making her liable to a stroke, was prone to infections and I was asked if they should put 'do not resuscitate' on her notes as she was so frail, you will be able to see that she had requirements for nursing care not social care."

That illustrates my problem with the boundaries between health and social care.

Another note from a constituent on 17 March reads:

"I am so frightened, the Greencroft centre has been my haven for a number of years, it has worked alongside my medication in keeping me as stable as possible. I suffer from Borderline Personality Disorder, Clinical Depression and Epilepsy. I also have eating problems and self harm as a coping mechanism to deal with extreme trauma! Since the devastating news that the Greencroft centre is closing, my illness has become worse. I get shaky and panicky, wondering how on earth I will cope after the 30th of April. I live alone and I am so scared."

It is at the edges that it really feels bad when things go wrong. It is not the robust clinical directors, who can run our magnificent hospital and make the best possible use of every penny that the taxpayer provides under whatever Government, who suffer. It is the people who are not going for straightforward surgery who suffer. It is the people who have problems with their mind who suffer. Perhaps they have mental health problems. Sometimes they are not in that category. However, it is always the people at the edges who suffer. That is why we must be particularly careful. I believe that there is a future, and we must ensure that it comes to pass when we get through the current crisis.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on raising this issue. He has put it in passionate terms as it affects his constituency. My constituency is not seeing the closure of cottage hospitals. We have none; we have no cottage hospital-type facility. I wish we did. It has been suggested that the Amblescroft unit, which has closed, would make an ideal community unit as a sort of halfway house. We should not be seeing the closure of the hospital alternative scheme and community nursing, and that is without consultation with the GPs, incidentally.

There is a tremendous future, but it is no good pretending that everything is fine or that money alone will solve the problem. The issue is all about the sort of management that we want to see. Of course, that must be extremely efficient, but not to the point of harsh delivery and harsh, sudden decisions that have huge consequences for a small number of vulnerable people in our communities.

The health service in South Wiltshire is strong. It has always been good and will get better because of the people who work in it. They include consultants who are attracted by the quality of life and therefore do not wish to move on to further their careers in London teaching hospitals or even Southampton. They want to stay where they are to serve the people of South Wiltshire. That is why the number of consultants in Salisbury has doubled in the 23 years for which I have been the Member of Parliament. It is why the morale among all the people in the heath service, whether clinicians, porters, cleaners or administrators, is so high.

The one thing that dashes everyone's hopes is management by crisis, which we have been seeing recently. I hope that before too long we will be through that phase and back on track towards ever better health services for the people of Wiltshire.

3.13 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on securing the debate and on the powerful way in which he made his case. The hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), whom I am glad to see is back in his place, asked us to praise those who work in the health service, and I do so unstintingly. The midwives, nurses and doctors do an enormously important and very hard task, and on many occasions they are asked to do much more than any of us would be prepared to do in the hours that are given to them. However, I want to say this to the hon. Gentleman, and it comes not from Conservative politicians, but from the doctors, nurses and midwives in my constituency, who are up in arms about what they see as the undermining of local health services. They are the dedicated ones who are saying to me, "Please stand up in Parliament and speak for our health services, because they are in danger of being destroyed." I hope that he will respect their views.

It was not Conservative politicians who booed and heckled the Secretary of State for Health the other day when she went to meet Unison. It was those who work in the health service who did that, because they are desperate. They suddenly see so much of what they believe in and of what they have worked for being undermined and destroyed. I say this to the hon. Gentleman in all seriousness. I shall not make a very party political speech. I listened carefully to the Secretary of State the other day when she said that this was the best year for the health service ever. I listened carefully when the Prime Minister said that we are, through our reforms, going to create a health service that will provide for people what they want, not what they are given. I start from that point.

The patients in my constituency, my electors, want their two community hospitals, their two minor injuries units and their maternity service, but that is not what they are offered. My hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire rightly spoke about the so-called consultation document. I say "so-called" because I have been in politics long enough to know what something is about when it sets out options with a preferred option—it is a little bit of cosmetics to cover a decision that has already been taken.

The first option, which is set out in the document as the most favourable because it saves the most money, leaves no community hospitals in my constituency. Savernake and Devizes would close. It leaves no minor injuries units in my constituency; both of those would close as well. It gets rid of the maternity unit in Devizes. It offers "consideration of"—not even a promise—a primary care centre. That is the new idea of glorified GPs' surgeries. There would be only one—for 100,000 people in the Kennet area. The hon. Member for North Swindon tries to tell me that I should go around saying that my health service has improved. I would like to see him try to make that argument in those circumstances.

Mr. Wills: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will forgive me if I ask for clarification. I am not sure who he is blaming for this state of affairs. He segued elegantly from blaming the Government to blaming the PCT for a local decision. With all due respect, he cannot have it both ways. Either he believes in localism, in which case a local organisation—the PCT in this case—is taking local decisions for local people, which he may disagree with, or he thinks that the national Government should intervene, in which case he is at odds with his party's much vaunted adherence to localism. I am sure that he will say that it is both, but can he clarify which is his position?

Mr. Ancram: I am happy to do that in the course of my remarks because I am not someone who makes a criticism without trying to suggest a solution. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will want to wait and listen to that.

Devizes hospital closes under all three of the options offered, so the people of Devizes are given three options, none of which suits them—none of which, in the Prime Minister's words, provides them with what they want. That is why I am advising them to ignore the consultation options and to write in to say that they want their community hospital retained. When I was elected in 1992, we were promised a new one. From then on, under the Conservative Government and the Labour Government, we were told that we would get one, but then suddenly, out of the blue, the hospital is to go. The people of Devizes feel betrayed not only by the local PCT, but by this Government.

I refer to what is happening as vandalism. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire said, the Government talk about their belief in community hospitals, but proceed to stand back while community hospitals are closed. The reason for their closure is not that they are not needed. It is the reason that stands behind the whole of the consultation document: they have run out of money. That is the truth. This is not about better health care or reforming the health service. It is about how we deal with a deficit—a deficit that should never have arisen. The Government have poured money into the national health service—they have doubled the money over nine years—but my constituency has seen less and less provision during that time. That is a real question that the Government have to answer. I shall come on to how I think they can.

All I can say to the hon. Member for North Swindon is that to talk about the best year for the health service ever is, in my constituency, a cruel jibe. It is a cruel jibe to the people who look to the health service to care for them, and to the people who work in the health service. I attended a meeting the other day in Devizes about the potential closure of the hospital there. The people who were most vocal were the people who run the hospital, the people who run the maternity unit, the doctors themselves. Those people are saying, "This is not what we believed the Labour Government meant when they said that they were going to save the national health service in 24 hours."

The simple truth is that we have been underfunded. I shall explain how I can make that claim and I hope that the Minister listens. I went to see one of her predecessors five or six years ago about the maternity unit and the hospital in Devizes and I talked about underfunding then. We have been underfunded in three ways. First, we are required to pay for the deficit caused by a misjudgment in 1992 in the Royal United hospital in Bath relating to its IT systems. That historic debt has grown and grown and now all PCTs are being asked to bear their share of it. That is nothing to do with us or our health provision, but we are being penalised for it. That is one reason that the debt has accumulated over the years.

I told the Minister's predecessor years ago, "Write that off. Give the new PCT that you have invented a chance to succeed and at least we will see whether the reform you are putting forward is going to work." Unfortunately, my plea fell on deaf ears, but I make it again because that change would have a significant effect on the way in which the reformed PCT could move forward.

The second reason—the Minister must know about this—is that we never received our full eligibility for capitation. Year after year, we have fallen short of it, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) will make that point in his speech. We have been underfunded. No one makes any quarrel about that. We have not had the money that we deserved.

Thirdly, we have been underfunded because proper account has never been taken of the problems of being in a rural area. Why do I say that? Last year, as the Minister knows—I am sure that she will make a big thing of this—that problem was recognised. We got a 3 per cent. increase in recognition of what is called rurality. That in itself recognised that we were underfunded in the years before, when rurality was not recognised. During those years—I have to admit that some of them were under our Government—that underfunding became cumulative, our debt got bigger and bigger, and now we are being penalised for that. Will the Minister examine that underfunding? There is no point telling my PCT in its current or reformed state that it has to meet the deficit. Unless the fundamentals are dealt with, we will be back here in four years' time facing more cuts. The system cannot work because the basis on which it is funded is not realistic.

Mr. Wills: I rise to support the right hon. and learned Gentleman on that point. I am grateful to him for outlining the reasons for underfunding in such analytical detail. May I add to his plea on the issue of the funding of deficits by PCTs that did not accumulate those deficits? Swindon PCT is extremely well run and in balance, but it is being asked to fund deficits for PCTs that have not been so well run. I agree with my hon. Friend: this problem must be sorted out because it creates enormous ill feeling. I am happy to rise in support of that point.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman referred to me as his hon. Friend and I take that as a genuine compliment. He and I have known each other for a long time and we try to work together on various issues. However, I say this in all seriousness. When the Prime Minister says in Parliament, as he did fairly recently, that he knows that people in his constituency believe that the health service has improved, I do not deny it. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire pointed out, funding there is one third higher per head than ours. I suspect that, if we got that level of funding, we would not be facing such problems and my constituents might also be saying that the health service has improved.

The point is that we are not getting the funding that we should and as a result, we are facing total medical vandalism. My constituents will end up with one primary care centre. Their hospitals, minor injuries unit and maternity unit will have gone. How can anyone argue that that is not a health service in decline, on a local basis?

I make the plea again. If we are to argue that the health service is about providing service for all equally, and that it should be free at the point of delivery and free at the point of need, it is wrong to have a situation where the Prime Minister's constituency gets more than mine without any justification as to why his constituents need more medical care than mine. Someone told me the other day that it is to do with urban deprivation, but I can tell hon. Members that there is rural deprivation too. It may not be quite so obvious, but it exists and my constituents have as much right to care as others in the country do.

We are considering what is essentially a reform based on the need to cut expenditure in our area. That is totally wrong. It is short-sighted and in time we will find that the health service has been cut to such an extent that it cannot be revived. I hope that the Government will reconsider the matter. I hate to use historical analogies, but listening to the Secretary of State say that the health service has had the best year ever, and listening to the Prime Minister say that everyone knows that it has improved, reminds me of nothing more than the wonderful music Nero played on his fiddle as Rome burned.

3.25 pm

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on securing a debate on the important issue of health care in Wiltshire. I want to address important issues about health care in Wiltshire, but I have to say that I find it gut-wrenching to hear the Conservative party talk about the NHS in the terms we have heard this afternoon, when they opposed £8 billion of the money that is currently being spent. When I intervened on the hon. Gentleman on that point, he said, "The Liberal Democrats say spend some more money". But he proceeded to say, "We only get £900 or so per head in Wiltshire. If only we got what they got in Sedgefield, it would all be fine." He appears to be looking in two different directions at once. Either he thinks that Wiltshire needs more money, or he does not.

Mr. Ancram: It does.

Steve Webb: The right hon. and learned Gentleman says that it clearly does. When I asked the hon. Member for North Wiltshire why he voted against the £8 billion that is currently spent, he gave no answer because he obviously does not have one.

Mr. Gray: I have two perfectly sensible answers. Item one: it is not about how much one spends, but the way one spends it. Item two: there is one cake, and we are talking about the way in which the cake is carved up. From the figures I cited earlier on, it appears that the cake has been carved up substantially in favour of Labour-represented areas such as Sedgefield.

Steve Webb: There we go. We get two inconsistent points of view. The hon. Gentleman said that it is about not how much one spends, but the way one spends it. Why could the £900 per head in Wiltshire not be spent more effectively?

Mr. Gray: It's both.

Steve Webb: The hon. Gentleman says it is both. He cannot hold these two positions simultaneously. What is needed is more money, but apparently it is right to oppose a tenth of current NHS spending, which is more than was raised by the penny on national insurance that he also opposed. Imagine the cuts to Wiltshire health services without that extra tenth of spending. That is what he voted for, and that is extraordinary.

Mr. Wills: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way—everyone is my friend today. I wondered whether he heard any Conservative Members suggest practical ways in which money could be spent more effectively.

Steve Webb: To be fair, the hon. Member for North Wiltshire mentioned one clear waste of money, which has been the process of going from health authorities to primary care groups to primary care trusts to the reinvention of health authorities, which is pretty much the same as the number you first thought of. That process has cost a lot of money. No one could dispute that. That money would have been better spent on front-line patient care.

Clearly, there has been waste, but I take the general point of the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills). We hear the comments made, but there are practically no suggestions. There is no suggestion of an overall increase in NHS funding in comparison with present levels as far as I can see. There is a suggestion that Wiltshire and other areas get more and the north of England gets less, but I remind Conservative Members who have spoken that the Conservative Government presided over a system—as all Governments do—where the more prosperous bits of the country get less per head on average, and the less prosperous bits get more. I do not accept the idea that a Conservative Government would do anything different because they did not when they had a chance to do so. I hope that the electorates of Wiltshire and beyond have long memories because 18 years passed by and those issues were not addressed.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman says rich areas should get less and poor areas more. Does he realise that a survey on rural deprivation in Wiltshire was carried out by a well known local Liberal about six years ago precisely in order to show that the concept that a rural area such as Wiltshire was richer than other areas was wrong? Is the hon. Gentleman going to deny that and chuck it in the basket because it does not suit his case?

Steve Webb: So why did the Conservatives not address that point during 18 years in office? The people in Wiltshire are no doubt told that if they vote Conservative they will get more money for health care in Wiltshire, but I do not suppose Conservative candidates in the north-east of England, who obviously have no hope of getting elected, go around saying, "We will take money off you". That is very mysterious.

I have some common ground with other hon. Members. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) made a measured and thoughtful contribution, which raised some serious points, in the midst of a lot of good things happening in the NHS. Like others, I have huge admiration for the work of those in the front line of the NHS.

The hon. Gentleman rightly said that there are real problems related to the health and social care boundary. That is a major problem and I hope that any reorganisation of PCTs will not undermine successful joint working between social services and health. It is less of an issue in Wiltshire, where the merging of PCTs at least increases the chance of coterminosity between social services authorities and health authorities, but that is not the case in my area, where the Government will undermine the existing links and break them. He made that important point, and I think one other.

Mr. Gray: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Steve Webb: I have rather less time than other hon. Members have had. I have only five minutes, but I shall give way.

Mr. Gray: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, but I think that in fact, he has plenty of time. I forgot to mention one problem that we have had recently with the primary care trust. It has withdrawn from joint ventures with the county council. Wiltshire county council is already bearing between £3 million and £6 million, and it looks like it will get worse. It means that either the council tax will have to go up, which it presumably cannot do because of capping, or valuable services for the most vulnerable in our society will be cut. That is the reality.

Steve Webb: I do not have any problem with that point, because in my judgment those budgets should all be pooled. The idea that we try to draw arbitrary dividing lines, with the resultant shifts in budget, is absurd. It is a long-standing problem.

The hon. Member for Salisbury alluded to the pace of reform. He was right to do so, and his point needs expanding. The front-line staff in Wiltshire face initiative after initiative and change after change, and they get almost no notice. For example, they receive payment by results and per procedure, but they do not get told how much it will be until they are into the financial year in which they have to act.

The hon. Gentleman also rightly talked about reacting to financial crises, rather than having a measured, long-term reform process. We are almost six years into a 10-year NHS plan. Had the Government set out a 10-year vision at the start and then steadily reformed in a manner that was announced in advance, so that the trust could respond to the new incentive structures and make measured, long-term plans, we might have got much further. Instead, there is a sudden change in the financial rules and a requirement to sort out decades of deficits and problems in weeks. It is gross mismanagement, and it comes from the top.

That situation is interesting. The hon. Member for North Swindon referred to his local primary care trust being in balance and that being synonymous with being well managed. He complained that the trust was bailing out others in deficit, and that they, by definition, according to him, were not well managed. It is not like that. There are all sorts of reasons why some trusts are in deficit and others are not. I am sure that the quality of management varies, but there is a weak correlation between deficit and poor management.

Almost all trust costs are determined centrally. The GP contract, consultants contract, "Agenda for Change" and the tariff are all set centrally. The trusts are given centrally determined costs, they are then given centrally imposed targets, and when the numbers do not add up, they are told that they do not manage efficiently or effectively.

Dr. Murrison: By that token, is the Liberal Democrat position that the cuts announced by the PCT should be made? That is the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument.

Steve Webb: The logic of my argument is that more effective financial health service management by the Government would have prevented the deficits arising in the first place. Much financial imbalance and dislocation in the health service is caused by having to deal with sequential and constant reform. It has wasted huge amounts of money, and the responsibility for it lies with central Government.

What do we do about that, and how are the people of Wiltshire going to see improved health services? One thing that they will not do is benefit from fake, sham consultation.

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Steve Webb: I had better not, because I am running out of time.

The British public have been consulted about health as never before—and ignored as never before. As the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) said, a consultation that does not even provide the option of keeping the community hospital open, is no consultation at all. Along with other Members present, I am a patron of the Community Hospitals Acting Nationally Together group. It has highlighted effectively the Government's rhetoric that community hospitals are right, and the reality that hospitals are shutting throughout Wiltshire, Gloucestershire and elsewhere. There is a disjunction between what the Government say they believe in and what is happening.

The Secretary of State says "More community facilities and more hospitals", and the Labour party manifesto says "More community hospitals". But in reality, up to all Wiltshire's community hospitals are closing. Will the Minister clarify the connection between the two? The Secretary of State says it, so why is she not making it happen? What is she doing to deliver that promise? The reality for the people of Wiltshire is quite the contrary, and I agree that the consultations are a sham.

My final observation is about national and local decision making. The people of Wiltshire should frame the health services for Wiltshire. There must be national standards and a national context, but, as far as possible, decision making should be local. It should be local and democratically accountable, not, as the hon. Member for Salisbury said, performed by non-executive directors who have been told to keep their heads down, and whom nobody elected and nobody can get rid of. That is where I differ from the Government, who claim to devolve, but keep the power in the centre and set so much of the local framework that there is little local discretion. It is also where I differ from Conservative Members, whom I do not think want elected, democratic accountability in the national health service. Again, when given the opportunity to introduce it, they did not.

If local decisions are taken about the national health service, as they should be, elected, not appointed, people should oversee them. I am not clear whether that is the Conservative party's position, and I hope that their spokesman will clarify it.

3.35 pm

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): We have had a lively debate, and it has been good to hear so many right hon. and hon. Friends, mainly, and other hon. Members contribute to the debate. Money lies at the heart of this matter, as with everything, but it is about not simply the total of money spent on the health service in Wiltshire, but how that money has been spent. It is a cause for regret that the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) spent most of his time laying into the previous Conservative Administration, without offering anything positive—a Liberal Democrat vision, if you like—for health care in Wiltshire. No doubt, it will be noted by those in the county who might be foolish enough to consider supporting the Liberal Democrats.

[Dr. Andrew Murrison]

At the heart of the funding allocation for our county, as elsewhere, lies the resource allocation weighted capitation formula. It is an 87-page document that I do not recommend to anybody. From the formula, it is clear that for a number of reasons, Wiltshire gets a relatively raw deal, chiefly because of its cost drivers, which are not adequately reflected in the formula. My hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) read out some of the comparisons in funding that Wiltshire can expect, and what applies elsewhere. It is clear that we lie far down the funding league table. Of course, money matters; it would be foolish to suggest otherwise. However, the issue is also about how that money is spent, and that is chiefly what the Conservative debate has been about this afternoon.

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify the basis of his point? He seems to be making several different points all in one. Is he talking about what he considers to be the relative unfairness of Wiltshire's funding, the absolute sums involved, the way in which whatever money is allocated is actually spent, or all of the above? Will he remind the House of the increase in NHS funding that Wiltshire has received since 1997?

Dr. Murrison: The answer is all of the above. Of course it is, and I thought I made that clear. The hon. Gentleman will also remember that the Opposition went into the previous election pledging to match the Government's spending on the national health service—a point that the Liberal Democrats might like to bear in mind.

It is important to remember that the issue is about not simply spending money. That is a lazy way to approach the issue. If we were to approach it in that way, as the Liberal Democrats do, we would not move on at all. The question is about how we spend the money. In Wiltshire, it is not clear whether the money has been and is being spent in a way that will maximise the effect for patients.

We have talked about the primary care trust. My view on the way in which it has contributed to the sorry pass in which we find ourselves are best left outside the Chamber. It would be unfair simply to lay into the primary care trust. Ministers need to own the issue, not least because of their stated commitment in the White Paper, "Our health, our care, our say: a new direction for community services", which appears to be completely at odds with what is happening on the ground.

The Minister must know that the preferred option of the Kennet and North Wiltshire and West Wiltshire primary care trusts is to close all community hospitals, with one particular exception. That is the reality. How on earth does it marry with the intentions laid down in that White Paper, which is just weeks old? It simply will not do. I shared the delight of my right hon. and hon. Friends when I read that document. It is rare for a member of the official Opposition to be delighted in such a way, but I genuinely was when I came to paragraph 6.42, which laid out clearly and categorically—no ifs, no buts, no margin for error—the Government's support for community hospitals.

Such support accords with the views of the vast majority of my constituents. Frankly, I do not need a sham consultation exercise to know what people in my constituency want in respect of local health care. Surely none of us does who keeps an ear to the ground in our constituencies. I am sure that that goes for all Members here this afternoon. We know what people want, they tell us all the time, and it is not just the usual suspects but also those so-called hard-to-reach groups that the Minister says she is so keen to listen to. I presume that it is for those people that she has held hugely expensive consultation exercises across the country. We listen to those groups just as much as we listen to anybody else, and they say that they want the model of health care that is, in fact, supported by that document, yet the primary care trust—the Minister's vicars on earth in Wiltshire—are doing something completely different. Ministers surely must understand that that is not acceptable, yet so far I have not seen any measures by Ministers to curtail what is happening on the ground.

I hope that the Minister, who has listened carefully and attentively to what has been said this afternoon, will go to her officials and ask them, through the strategic health authority, to try to work out exactly what the PCT is doing in Wiltshire and to try to accord it more realistically with her Government's policy in the White Paper. I sincerely ask her to do that, and, if she does, I shall be the first publicly to shower her with laurels in Wiltshire. I am sure that her party would benefit, not that it would do her much good.

Mr. Ancram: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the Government were to tell the PCTs to do something different, they would have to deal with the areas of underfunding that I discussed? The consultation document sets out the financial position. At present, PCTs are working within such restrained budgets that they have to make many unpleasant decisions that fly in the face of what the Government want them to do.

Dr. Murrison: I entirely agree with my right hon. and learned Friend, and I share his disquiet at the behaviour of some non-executive directors, who I believe should represent the views of local people. Too often, I find that they have been taken into the organisational big tent and will not speak up on behalf of people, and that is a worry. If they have a value at all, it is precisely in articulating the concerns of local people. They may have a view, of course, and they may feel driven by logic in a particular direction. Nevertheless, their function surely is to articulate the concerns of local people. However, often, we find that that is not happening, and that is a great pity. I take his point entirely.

I suppose that I feel for the PCT and its officials, as they are trying to balance the books, and that cannot be easy. It is our function to shout and scream when we see a problem that involves money. I hope that the Minister will listen to my right hon. and learned Friend's comments, particularly in respect of the write-off, which is only fair. It took me, as the MP for Westbury, quite a long time to work out exactly how the deficit had arisen and how on earth had we come to that point. I have no doubt that, without the deficit, the options document would not have been necessary. As hon. Friends have said, it is clear that it was driven not by a desire to improve health care in Wiltshire but by the need to sort out the deficit, which is largely historically driven.

Mr. Wills: The hon. Gentleman did not exactly address the question of the right hon. and learned

Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), but I would be grateful if he did so. The right hon. and le. ied Gentleman is making a case that Wiltshire is underfunded. I would be grateful for clarification as to whether Conservative Members are arguing for even greater investment in the national health service overall, so that Wiltshire can get its due share and be able to deal with the financial issues, or whether they are arguing for a reallocation of some of the existing pot to Wiltshire, and, if so, from which part of the country they are seeking that reallocation.

Dr. Murrison: It is clear from the fact that so many health trusts in Wiltshire are in deficit that it is not simply because of bad management. It would be a bizarre statistical quirk were there to be so many trusts in Wiltshire that were in deficit for that reason. Trusts try to benchmark their provision of services against other trusts, so I am driven to conclude that there is a problem with the resource allocation weighted capitation formula. I hope that we can look at that to ensure that the cost drivers in Wiltshire are adequately reflected. Given that it is so low in the league table of spending, I believe that it gets less than its fair share. I would say as a constituency MP but also as a Front-Bench spokesman that the formula does not adequately reflect some of the cost drivers. I hope that that answers the hon. Gentleman's point.

I would like to turn to how we can make the best use of our resources. Shutting down community hospitals simply will not work. If the case mix is right, community hospitals are, in fact, cost effective. I have made that case repeatedly in the Minister's presence, and I rather hoped that Ministers might look into it. The data are available, and it is simply not sufficient to say that money will be saved by closing down community hospitals, as the costs are passed on somewhere else. They are passed on to acute hospital trusts, yet the cost of treating someone in a community hospital is probably one third the cost of treating them in hospitals such as the Royal United, the Salisbury District or the Great Western.

Costs are also passed on to social services, and we are seeing that big time in Wiltshire. My right hon. and hon. Friends have received a letter from Councillor Jane Scott, the leader of Wiltshire county council, in which she makes the point that the PCT, which has a turnaround director in place and the district auditor breathing down its neck, is passing costs on to social services. One may say that that is well and good, that the PCT is putting its books in order, but the truth of the matter is that the cost to the public purse of treating and managing people in need is not being affected one jot. It is simply an accounting exercise in passing costs elsewhere, in many cases to bodies that are more expensive for treating a condition or set of conditions, in the case of the elderly and the long-term sick. Everybody loses: the public purse does not benefit, patients do not benefit and, my word, carers do not benefit at all.

One of the problems with passing costs on to social services—putting people at the door of social services—is that carers bear much of the burden. That burden is uncosted. As far as the state is concerned, it is a free good. We are all guilty, all too often, of ignoring that, but a great deal of what is happening in Wiltshire at present will, unfortunately, result in carers picking up much of the tab.

One or two hon. Members mentioned so-called super-surgeries. They appear quite often in the consultation document to which we have referred. It is interesting that when one gets on the phone to speak to those at the PCT who are responsible for the document and asks them precisely what they mean by super-surgeries or primary care centres, they are not too sure. At the end of the day, what it boils down to is a large general practitioner surgery. We are not clear about precisely what services will be offered on the premises.

I have been accused of being sentimental about bricks and mortar when discussing community hospitals. What is more sentimental—what represents more of a preoccupation with bricks and mortar—than someone saying that they will set up a primary care centre without saying what will be done in the building? The consultation document states that screening services will be carried out, which is very nice, but, scratching a bit further, the precise form of screening is obscure. We understand that there will be GP-run dermatology clinics, but GPs are perfectly capable of running clinics from their existing premises. We understand that optometrist-run assessments will continue locally for patients with cataracts. As it happens, Westbury community hospital, which is scheduled for closure, has an extremely well received cataract service that recently treated Christopher Booker, who talked about his experiences positively in the press recently.

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Murrison: I have been rather generous in giving way, but I will do so one last time.

Mr. Wills: The hon. Gentleman has been very generous, and I am grateful to him. I want to help him. If he wants to know what these surgeries can deliver, I invite him—and indeed the Minister—to Taw Hill surgery in my constituency to see exactly what can be done with a forward-looking super-surgery.

Dr. Murrison: I would be delighted to visit, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for the invitation. It is amazing what living in a Labour marginal seat can do for someone, if I may put it that way. I am not aware of any such premises in my part of the world. I would have to ask him precisely how the super-surgery—I assume that that is what it is—to which he refers deals with the core of primary care, which is the care of the chronically sick and the elderly.

Time does not permit me to wax lyrical about primary care, how it should be and what damage the Government are doing to it, but the heart of primary care is having to deal with the long-term sick and the elderly. I am afraid that it is those groups who stand to suffer greatly from the amalgamation of GPs' surgeries into so-called super-surgeries that will reduce choice and make access much worse.

I am afraid that mental health in my constituency is heading south, both literally and metaphorically. We are losing Charterhouse, which has 26 in-patient beds for the elderly mentally infirm. My constituency is losing all four of its community hospitals. We are losing 60 beds at the Royal United hospital. The common thread in all those closures is the effect on the elderly, the mentally infirm and the most vulnerable. In what way is this the best year ever for my constituents, for Wiltshire and for the NHS?

3.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I have less than 10 minutes to speak, so I probably will not be able to take interventions, and I might have to write to people on a number of the issues raised. I congratulate the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on securing the debate. Clearly, the Conservative, Labour and Liberal Democrat parties are represented here today by champions for their local communities, and that is right and proper.

If I could make a point about the comment made by the hon. Gentleman on my activity yesterday, it is fair enough for me as Minister with responsibility for public health—that is my main role—to preface my contribution by mentioning something that has not been discussed much today. I want to talk about why it is so important that, at the heart of the discussion on what hospitals provide and what more could be provided in the community, there should be debate about whether we are prepared to challenge the traditional ways in which our health services have been provided.

There has been an emphasis on treatment, which has improved enormously over the past 10 to 20 years in terms of drugs, technology and so forth. The area that has not been given attention is the role that we can all play in public health to prevent long-term conditions that have to do with how people live their lives. More could be done on that. That is a challenge for all of us, because—many hon. Members raised this point—that is about how we can best meet people's needs, get ahead of the curve, and ensure that there are facilities closer to where people live, particularly those in communities that, because of health inequalities, are not accessing services. How can we change their futures? By considering that, we could get better health outcomes, but we also have to challenge the thinking on where finances are directed. We have to think about how we can turn around our thoughts about the health service to prevent and to manage long-term conditions. Importantly, we should also think about shifting some funding from the acute to the primary sector in working on prevention.

Something like just 2 per cent. of NHS spend, which we know is at historically high levels, is currently defined as being on the prevention side. The challenge for all of us is to think outside the box about how those services are provided. I have no problem with what I am doing in promoting public health, because that is at the heart of changing the way that we think about health services.

Performance across Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire has improved. The Secretary of State, backed by the Prime Minister, was trying to put in context the fact that, in a number of areas, certainly when I became a Member of Parliament in 1997, uppermost in people's minds were waiting times, the amount of time that people spent waiting in accident and emergency, cancer and heart disease, and poor service. That was eight, nine or 10 years ago. In all those areas, there has been improvement. In the constituencies of hon. Members present today, there were two patients waiting more than six months for in-patient treatment this February. That is compared with more than 11,000 people waiting more than nine months in March 1997. As of December 2005, there were 12 patients waiting 13 weeks for out-patient treatment with a consultant, compared with nearly 14,000 patients in May 1998.

In December 2005, 99.2 per cent. of people with urgent suspected cancer referrals from GPs were seen by specialists within two weeks of referral. Also in December 2005, 98.8 per cent. of patients were seen, diagnosed and treated within four hours of arrival at accident and emergency. I believe strongly that some of that is to do with extra resources. However, I also pay tribute, as other hon. Members have done, to staff, not only for their hard work, but for their willingness to look at their traditional working practices and think about how they can deal with them differently. That is about not just the acute sector and hospitals, but primary care. For example, we all know that there are significant numbers of people who go through accident and emergency whose needs could be dealt with elsewhere in the community.

Dr. Murrison: Will the Minister give way? I will be quick.

Caroline Flint: I will take just one intervention from the hon. Gentleman.

Dr. Murrison: I entirely agree with the Minister's comments about health care workers, but a very senior member of the cataract team at Westbury community hospital, who has been instrumental in the way that the Minister describes, came to see me recently, and she was distraught at the way in which the service is being shut down.

Caroline Flint: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I cannot respond to that straight away, although I am happy to look into it. I will try to get on with my response to comments made by other hon. Members.

A point was made by the hon. Member for North Wiltshire about the consultation process. I understand that there was lengthy public engagement prior to the consultation. That complied with the requirement to consult the public that is set out in section 11 of the Health and Social Care Act 2001. The oversight and scrutiny committee was consulted, too.

As for what is next, and the options on the table, the OSC can apply for independent review if it believes the consultation process to have been flawed, or it can apply for judicial review. That is also an option for local people. I have had a look at the document, but I am not here to sign up to any particular option. Some hon. Members have left parts of the consultation document out of their contributions. Those parts include considering having new neighbourhood teams to cover all community areas, and providing 24-hour access and new primary care centres.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) made a point about the opportunity to provide services currently provided in hospitals in super-health centres that include GP practices. I have seen that for myself. I have been to practices where there is not only a GP practice and hospital-based services, but pharmacies and opticians, and they are connected to a network. Therefore, there is a lot in the document that addresses the need for community-based services and the way in which they can be fit for the future. Of course, community hospitals have a role in that. The Secretary of State did say that they had a role, but she said that they had to justify it and say how they would meet future needs and provide a range of services, and that is right.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon talked about progress in his area. I would just like to acknowledge my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove), who is here this afternoon. Her local primary care trust's finances are in balance. I am not saying that the problem is always poor management; some poor managers have left, leaving others to pick up the pieces. However, there are questions to be asked about why PCTs in some areas can balance their budgets, consider how they are operating and improve.

There is a distinct lack of understanding about health inequalities and the needs of communities on the part of those on the Conservative Benches. [Interruption.] Well, I am afraid that there is. There has been no acknowledgement that there are certain needs that have to be met in terms of health outcomes. I am sure that there are health inequalities in their areas, and I hope that, if services are organised, the needs of those communities can be met.

King Edward VII Hospital

4 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I am glad to have secured the debate. It is a tragedy that King Edward VII hospital in Midhurst should have been forced to close; it was a unique, independent, non-profit making charitable foundation. Most independent hospitals like it were victims of Nye Bevan's nationalisation programme in the 1940s. This hospital was one of the few that got away. Its structure should have enabled it to have become a template for how a foundation hospital operates today.

It was genuinely independent and provided very high standards of care at a reasonable cost—mostly at tariff rates for NHS patients. Since nationalisation in 1948, at least a third of the hospital's patients were from the NHS, and they were always treated in exactly the same way as private patients. At the time of its closure, nearly two thirds of the hospital's patients were NHS patients. A former Labour Minister described it to me as a template for foundation hospitals, and it is very sad to see it go. The first big loser of the closure has been the NHS itself.

Anyone who knew King Edward VII hospital knows that it was a fantastic place. There was a strong and caring team ethic, which is always present in good institutions and always missing in bad ones. I knew personally a good number of the people who worked there—the second big losers of the closure—and felt keenly for them when they lost their jobs. They were highly skilled and dedicated professionals, and some of them will not easily find alternative work in a local health care economy in which NHS services are contracting as we speak.

The third big losers are my constituents and the thousands of people from miles around who have used, or might have used, the hospital's excellent facilities. I first secured a Westminster Hall debate on the hospital three years ago, when it was initially threatened with closure. Fourteen MPs from the region came to my support, and I am grateful to see a number of them here today. The closure is not a local, but a regional, issue. Be under no illusion: this closure of capacity will not be fully replaced.

My constituents have lost a lot. The hospital provided very high levels of oncology treatment. It provided radiotherapy treatment with an advanced linear accelerator for 250 cancer patients a year; major cardiac surgery for 300 cases a year; interventional cardiology for a further 900 cases a year; orthopaedic surgery for 1,500 cases a year; major bariatric surgery for 150 cases a year; eye surgery for 200 cases a year; and it treated 14,000 outpatient cases a year.

A former Secretary of State for Health, the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), once said:

> "What you have within the National Health Service is . . . a system that frankly is not so much short of cash now . . . but a . . . system that is short of capacity."

A great chunk of capacity has just been closed. I wish the right hon. Gentleman was still right, because now we have a problem of both cash and capacity.

I should like to make three further points. First, I want briefly to discuss why the hospital closed, although there is not much point in lingering for too long on that, given that the milk has been spilt. Secondly, I should like to ask the Minister about the performance of Capio Healthcare UK, the health care provider that withdrew from the deal. Thirdly, I should like to place the hospital's closure in the context of what is going on in the regional health care economy.

Why did the hospital have to close? There were many reasons, and I shall not rehearse them all, especially as many of them were set out in the January 2003 debate that I mentioned. The immediate cause of closure was the decision a few weeks ago of Capio, a large Swedish health care provider, to walk away from a deal in which it had agreed in principle to construct a new hospital on the site.

The argument that terms could not be agreed with the developer, used publicly by Capio's management to explain their decision, has been flatly contradicted by everybody involved with the hospital—the trustees, the senior management, the provisional liquidator and the developer himself. The fact that Capio was not prepared to be frank, and relied instead on a bogus explanation, is important in one respect, of which the Minister should be aware: at the moment, the NHS is doing extensive business with Capio, and its cavalier attitude to frequently made oral and written commitments needs to be borne in mind in future dealings.

That would not be so concerning were it not for widespread allegations that the level of care provided by Capio, under contract to the NHS, may not be adequate. I am not making that allegation; I am not in a position to judge it. However, I strongly advise the Minister to ask the Department to consider the issue and to reassure herself, because Capio has recently been the subject of a number of media investigations.

With that in mind, I have four questions for the Minister. First, what assurances can she give that, given the closure of King Edward VII hospital, Capio will be able fully to perform the spine chain contract with the NHS known as GC4—the Minister will know what I am talking about—to supply the so-called Southampton gap? As she will know, that contract has four years to run and King Edward VII was, until a few weeks ago, doing roughly half the work implied by it.

Secondly, will the Minister undertake a study to provide reassurance that health outcome levels, for those treated as part of the Southampton gap spine chain contract, are at or above the levels for the NHS as a whole? Thirdly, what is the level of repeat surgery for the contracts performed by Capio and for the Southampton gap spine chain contract, and what is the most appropriate general equivalent NHS benchmark? Finally, will the Minister publish the level of repeat surgery, compared with a regional and national benchmark, for that part of the GC4 contract not supplied by King Edward VII hospital?

Those questions are detailed, and I do not expect the Minister to have the answers at her fingertips. She has a difficult job. If she gives me a clear pledge that she will consider my questions carefully, personally assure herself that there is no cause for concern and publish the detailed material for which I have asked, I will be happy. I should be grateful if she came back to me in writing. As she knows, I have already tabled a number of parliamentary questions on related issues. I also think that she should ask the Healthcare Commission to examine Capio's performance.

I want to leave the Minister with plenty of time to respond, and a number of colleagues have mentioned that they would like to say a few words.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for mentioning that; it occurred to me that other hon. Members might wish to participate. If they seek to do so during a half-hour Adjournment debate such as this, they must have the permission of the Member who secured the debate and of the Minister.

Mr. Tyrie: Thank you, Mr. Gale. They certainly have my permission.

On the effect of the closure on the regional health care economy, the plain and simple truth is that the standard of care in my constituency and the general area around it will fall and waiting times will rise. I have received a number of letters from doctors and a large number from patients telling me that exactly that is happening right now.

The closure comes at a time of unprecedented stress in the regional health care economy. The NHS is closing capacity at a significant rate while demand is rising sharply. Budgets are being cut sharply to deal with the burgeoning deficit both at my local hospital of St. Richard's in Chichester and throughout the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority, which has a deficit of £140 million.

Now is not the time to rehearse all the arguments about the absurd accounting that leads to the so-called deficit numbers, to which I just referred; nor is it the time to elaborate on the fact that cash is being drained away from my constituency as a consequence of ludicrous shortcomings in the weighting applied to the capitation formula.

The NHS is currently subject to cuts in services in many ways in my constituency, not only as a consequence of the two points that I just mentioned. As a result of the cuts, hundreds of letters were sent from St. Richard's hospital, even before the closure of the King Edward VII hospital, telling patients that they would have to wait longer for treatment. We are talking about sick, elderly people, who are often in pain, being told to wait.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I pay tribute to the assiduous, long-standing campaign that my hon. Friend has led in his constituency for this jewel in the crown of the local health economy, and to the enormous amount of work he has done on the local health economy. I visited the hospital, which some of my constituents use. Does he think that, at a time when we are losing capacity hand over fist, the loss to the local health economy of such an institution is a tragedy? The majority of its patients since the war have been NHS patients. The work has been done at an economic rate and the hospital is exceedingly popular with local people. The only implication of its closure must be longer waiting times and longer distances to travel to less popular hospitals for all of our constituents.

Mr. Tyrie: My hon. Friend is right. That is exactly what is going on right now. It is an appalling tragedy.

We are not talking about just any hospital, but about one that was part of the local community and was held in enormous esteem in the medical community, way beyond the local or even the regional health care economy, as was shown in the response when it first got into difficulties. That happened when the local health care economy withdrew a number of contracts, some would say deliberately and with the intention of trying to get it to close, because it was the sort of institution that the NHS found did not fit into its plans for the trend towards super-hospitals. We seem to be driving towards them inexorably against the wishes of our constituents in so many areas.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that there was a tendency in the early part of the Labour party's Administration to look down on the private sector, but that more recently they have been more favourable towards provision from that sector? It is not only among the medical establishment that the hospital was well regarded, but among users and patients, including those from my constituency.

Mr. Tyrie: That is right. The rhetoric that we have heard from the Government and a succession of Ministers is that we should want to develop exactly this type of institution: one that takes the best from the private sector and enables those skills to be translated into the public sector, with an organic and healthy relationship between the two. I made that point at the beginning of my remarks. That is why a former Minister—I did not ask permission to quote him, so I shall not name him—told me that this is exactly the sort of hospital that should serve as a template for what foundation hospital status means.

I have just described the appalling cuts in capacity that have been taking place in health care in my area. My constituents will put up with a lot, but their credulity is stretched when they turn on the television and hear the Secretary of State for Health saying:

"the NHS has just had its best year ever".

Such statements do not do the NHS, patients or politicians any good.

The closure of the hospital is only one symptom of a burgeoning health care crisis that is developing throughout the region, and dealing with it will not be easy. The Government have spent a huge amount of money without working out how to make it work productively. I warned that that would happen shortly after the Chancellor abandoned "Miss Prudence" and hitched up with Mr. Wanless, in 1999–2000. The Chancellor made a colossal mistake, announcing massive increases in health spending, having scarcely thought through how that the money could be translated into productivity gains. We are now reaping the consequences. A lot of taxpayers' money has been wasted.

The resulting problems are borne most heavily by my constituents and those in constituencies like mine. We must now find a way of making the books balance after huge sums have been spent needlessly. What is required now is the cash that has been, at least partly, wasted.

To his enormous credit, a previous Secretary of State—the right hon. Member for Darlington—listened carefully to the representations made by a number of us on the capacity constraints in the area three years ago. He showed more than just sympathy and understanding. I later reliably found out that he quietly took action. He did something to assuage those capacity constraints. I hope that the Minister can persuade her Secretary of State to follow in his footsteps.

I want to end by itemising in outline what such action will mean. It will mean restoring common sense to NHS accounting by abandoning the absurdity of the so-called RAB—resource accounting and budgeting—which double-counts a deficit, and moving towards the accounting practice that we would find were the institution in the private sector. It will also mean that the early introduction of payment by results has been indefinitely delayed. Why has that happened? It is because Labour knows that for every winner from the introduction of full PBR—the full tariff rate—there will be a loser. Where will the loser be? It will be a hospital or trust that is currently in surplus but is relatively inefficient, and those are often in Labour areas.

The action to which I was referring would entail a fundamental review of the capitation formula, which is a scandal if ever there was one. The formula is now hopelessly inadequate for the task of adjusting for health need across the country. It would also entail a genuine devolution of control to cost centres at the local level in a manner that rewards success and penalises failure. We currently have a system that has rewarded failure and is penalising success.

St. Richard's hospital has been identified by all the relevant independent studies as one of the most efficient hospitals in the country. It also provides very high levels of care. Yet it is in the process of being forced to contract. No other organisation in the world would tell a hospital that had been identified as one of the three best in the country by the Dr. Foster hospital guide immediately to start contracting services. In any ordinary, rational organisation, a successful institution is rewarded for success by being given more work, which St. Richard's is well capable of doing and wants to do.

There is a serious incentive failure and misalignment at the heart of the NHS—a managerial failure that runs straight to the Department. Its basis is not local effort and initiative; it is not failure at the local level. We are talking about a failure centrally, which, above all, must be addressed by the Minister and the Government.

4.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I am afraid that I was not informed that other hon. Members wanted to speak. I am unsure whether that would be helpful, as this is a short debate and I have not been able to consider some of the issues arising in their areas. However, I shall try to deal with most of the points made by the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), whom I congratulate on securing the debate. He raised concerns, particularly to do with Capio, that I hope to write to him about in detail.

I understand that the matter is of great concern to the hon. Gentleman and his constituents. The King Edward VII hospital was established in 1906, and it is much loved in the local community. I will check in Hansard what the hon. Gentleman said, but I hope I did not hear him correctly, because he seemed to suggest that Nye

[Caroline Flint]

Bevan, the architect of our national health service, had somehow got the development of it wrong. I think his comment was that the hospital was saved from the thrust of what Nye Bevan was trying to achieve in developing the health service.

Mr. Tyrie: Does the Minister think that the remaining independent hospitals in the country should be closed down?

Caroline Flint: I am not suggesting that. I was just making the point that the hon. Gentleman seemed to take the opportunity to attack the basis on which the Labour party, and particularly Nye Bevan, established the national health service. There is no doubt that in establishing the NHS, Nye Bevan had to deal with a number of competing interests. He had to deal with the existence of a variety of buildings that had been established as different sorts of organisations—as private hospitals, charitable hospitals and so forth—as well as with the way in which health professionals worked at that time. I am sure my party colleagues would agree that he had to make some compromises in doing what we think was the right thing to do—establishing the national health service.

Having said that, I should add that the national health service has long supported the King Edward VII hospital. I understand from colleagues working in health locally that some 30 per cent. of funding for that independent hospital came from the NHS. I think it is fair to say that the NHS supported the hospital in a number of ways in terms of the services it provided.

Prior to 2002, the hospital had encountered serious financial difficulties. Following the breakdown of negotiations with a large American health care provider, Hospital Corporation of America—HCA—the hospital went into provisional liquidation in December 2002. The NHS did not turn its back on the hospital. In January 2003, it announced that it would provide a further £900,000 of taxpayers' money to enable the hospital to remain fully operational while the liquidator negotiated with a prospective purchaser, Lincoln Holdings plc, and its partner, Capio Healthcare UK, on a deal to develop a new hospital facility. However, as the hon. Gentleman knows, Capio and Lincoln Holdings were unable to agree a deal to develop a new facility and, unfortunately, that led to the closure of the King Edward VII hospital, which was announced on 9 March 2006.

The hon. Gentleman asked detailed questions about Capio, and I will look into them and write to him. All I shall say at this stage is that the Department has had no direct involvement in the deal. That was not a matter for the NHS. However, given how things were progressing, we were surprised to hear that it had fallen through. I understand that Capio has been in conversation with the hon. Gentleman, and a letter detailing why the deal has not gone ahead was sent to him by the chief executive of Capio Healthcare UK.

However, I hope the hon. Gentleman will join me in congratulating the local NHS on the way in which it has responded to the difficulties presented by the closure of the hospital. It has demonstrated not only the resilience of the NHS, but its flexibility. In difficult circumstances for both staff and patients, it has shown that it has the ability to co-ordinate a response that ensures, as far as possible, continuity of patient care. For instance, Western Sussex primary care trust has ensured continuity of care for patients needing palliative care, and it has used the situation as an opportunity to address modernising its palliative care service by providing it in patients' homes. I understand that there is an innovative consultant locally, Peter Hargreaves, who is working with both the PCT and Macmillan Cancer Relief to look into how to develop hospice-at-home care.

I also understand that the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust has been able to provide treatment to patients who were previously receiving, or expecting to receive, treatment at the Kind Edward VII hospital. The Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority has worked with the local NHS to co-ordinate arrangements to secure treatment for all patients affected by the unexpected closure of this independent sector provider. Patients transferred from the King Edward VII hospital to other NHS providers are all scheduled to be treated within national standards, and I understand that there have been no problems in identifying NHS capacity to treat patients affected by the closure.

The local NHS has also been able to offer employment to a number of staff to fill critical clinical vacancies, and others have joined the nursing bank. I understand that a number of the doctors at the Kind Edward VII hospital already worked in other parts of the NHS elsewhere in the area, and that has helped. Also, 25 members of staff have joined the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust bank. As well as offering them employment opportunities and keeping their skills in the local community, that has supported the trust's strategy, which is linked to its financial situation, to reduce its spending on agency staff and use its own bank instead. We are taking action to deal with the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust deficit, and a turnaround team is working with the trust.

Patients without appointments are being contacted to advise them where their treatment will take place. The Surrey and Sussex SHA has advised officials that it is confident that all patients will be treated within the national waiting time standards.

Mr. Tyrie: Is it the case that a number of treatments that were being given at the Kind Edward VII hospital at the full tariff rate are now to be conducted at St. Richard's hospital at below tariff?

Caroline Flint: I will look into that and get back to the hon. Gentleman with more detail.

All the independent sector treatment centre patients are expected to be treated at the Capio New Hall hospital facility, and Capio has confirmed that it expects to be able to undertake the full case mix there. As I said, Surrey and Sussex SHA has advised us that the joint human resources team from Western Sussex PCT and the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust is working to help staff find vacancies. I also understand that the consultant and community specialist palliative care team has been transferred to the PCT to ensure that those specialist skills and that service is not lost to NHS patients in the area.

The hon. Gentleman raised some issues on clinical governance. I will deal with some of them now, and write to him on others. Providers are obliged through their Healthcare Commission registration to have clear, workable clinical governance frameworks in place, and they have a contractual responsibility to ensure that those frameworks reflect good clinical practice. Independent sector treatment centres are subject to rigorous contractual obligations called performance indicators, which stipulate the quality and cost of contracted procedures, and performance is monitored throughout the course of the provider's contract.

The hon. Gentleman raised concerns, which I am sure his party colleagues who are present share, about funding in the Surrey and Sussex SHA and the Hampshire and Isle of Wight strategic health authority areas, and the funding stream for the King Edward VII hospital. It must be noted that the SHAs are responsible for delivering overall financial balance for their local health communities. However, the NHS as a whole is in receipt of record resources because of this Government's policy of funding the NHS.

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): Does the Minister recognise that a disproportionate number of the deficits around the country are in West Sussex? The hospital served my constituents as well, and was much loved by them. Public confidence in the NHS locally has been seriously undermined by what is happening. Does the Minister accept that when the SHA consults on its plans to deal with those deficits, it is essential that the public are fully involved in that consultation and understand what is really being proposed for local NHS services, where the deficits are so serious?

Caroline Flint: There is a very good question to ask about why in some parts of the country people are experiencing deficits despite record investment, and others are not.

Finally, I have been provided with information that will be helpful. The Royal West Sussex NHS Trust will be paid the full tariff for the extra work it has offered to undertake resulting from the closure of the King Edward VII hospital. That is a good example of how the NHS, even when dealing with an independent hospital, is doing the business.

East Leeds (Regeneration)

4.30 pm

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): May I express my gratitude for the opportunity to raise this important matter, and my pleasure that you are in the Chair, Mr. Gale? The last time that I appeared before you was when you chaired the Committee on the infamous Higher Education Bill, when we debated tuition fees. I am grateful for your kindness then.

I start by paying tribute to my colleagues on Leeds city council. Over the years, I and others have had long discussions and arguments about how to tackle inner-city problems such as poverty, deprivation, bad housing, indifferent education, high levels of crime and vandalism, and consistently unacceptable unemployment levels. It has been argued that such problems cannot be solved, as attempts to do so have been made for decades. I was a councillor for 20 years and was involved in inner-city programmes and the like that were aimed at ending poverty. They never had that effect, but ended up simply doing things on the margin.

Leeds city council has accepted the argument that those individual programmes should be superseded by a major regeneration scheme with the objective of ending the two-speed economy and two-speed standard of living in Leeds, where there is high unemployment in the inner city and prosperity in the rest of the city. In a previous Adjournment debate, I talked about many of the sad facts of life in my constituency. Suffice it to say that three of my four wards are on the Department's list of the most deprived wards in the country, so it is accepted that there is a real problem in the inner city and my constituency.

I pay tribute to Councillor Keith Wakefield, who was the leader of the Labour group and who ran the council at the time. He started the process of procuring a private sector partner. I was worried when he lost control of the council and the Conservatives took over, but was later delighted and relieved to find that the local Conservative leader Andrew Carter and his colleague Councillor Les Carter, who handles neighbourhoods and housing, approached the matter with real sympathy and enthusiasm. However, the problem continues.

Regeneration takes two major forms, the first of which—I am sure that the Minister will know this from what is happening in east London—is gentrification. It is like the Scottish land clearances in past centuries. Local people are taken off the land, various bits are assembled, and work takes place with a developer to use it more profitably, regardless of the social effect on the people. That is property regeneration. It has its place because sometimes it is done a little more sensitively than I have suggested.

The other kind of regeneration is when we accept it in its fullest sense, as the physical regeneration of an area, as well as the regeneration of people. It is about making changes and ensuring that the objective is that local people share in the prosperity thrown up by development and business.

I have raised the subject because we are at an early stage in the regeneration process. Final discussions are going on with the private contractor, but I fear—for reasons that are not dogmatic, but understandable and straightforward—that the property-only type of regeneration might be winning over the property-and-people type of regeneration. The private partnership will throw up a considerable amount of money—I am not approaching the Minister with a begging bowl, as usually happens in debates on regeneration and inner cities—and it is estimated that the city council will get in the region of £120 million as its share of the profits from the regeneration. That is a pessimistic assessment because that money on its own would not be sufficient to fulfil the objectives, which are accepted by most people in Leeds. In fact, it would be a great temptation, because £120 million would allow the council to refurbish instead of change. It could be used on various parts of the social infrastructure—perhaps a new school, a library or community centre. We have had such temptations over the past 20 or 30 years, but refurbishing merely blunts poverty; it does not end it.

The argument that I hope the Minister will take to the Department is that a real partnership could be established between the Department and the Government, the other social partners and the local authority. If all the money was pooled with the local authority's current spending and the profits, and then spent differently, there would be every chance that people's ambitions would be met and that we would see an end to poverty and deprivation.

We could change people's lives. As it is, a few hundred houses in one ward were recently demolished. The tenants were given the choice of other council or social housing. If a scheme had been in place that had Government backing, the real alternative when knocking down those houses would have been to get a developer to build houses for sale and then give people the choice of continuing in a council house or going into home ownership for the first time. However, they were not given the choice.

As the scheme rolls on, I fear that that is what will increasingly happen. We will see clearances and new houses built, but they will be priced out of the reach of local people. As a result, they will continue to live in social housing—pressure will continue to be placed on social housing—instead of having their entire lives changed.

That might seem to be an exaggeration, but I shall explain two of the problems. The first is housing. The other day, Councillor Les Carter, who is in charge of housing, expressed the worry that even if he accepted my argument, he could not deal with the back-to-back properties that are to be found in great numbers in inner-city Leeds. Those were built not during the previous century, but in the century before, and were meant for working people who served in clothing factories and the like. Sadly, they are still being used to raise families. They have been refurbished time and again, but they should have disappeared. Trendy architects like to put great exteriors on them, but they have no gardens and are on crowded and dangerous streets. They are certainly not the place to bring up a family in the 21st century.

How do we deal with that problem? Should we demolish them? How do we move people, and how do we give them a choice of properties? The large council estates in Leeds were built in the 1920s. They were very welcome then, because they replaced slum homes in the city centre. The estates were seen as a great improvement—and they were—but they are now 70 years old. Knowing the aspirations of today's young people, it is not where they see their future. For them, it is not progress, but we have so much of that type of housing. With so much social housing, my constituency is unbalanced in terms of housing tenure. That is very good electorally, of course, but it is not so good for the individuals concerned. When that feeds through to schools, police time and social services, we have a troubled area, with all the services competing for resources, and education is a particular concern.

My point is the way in which we approach the problem. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is exceedingly generous with money when we want to refurbish council houses. That is an expensive job, as they have been up for more than 60 years. But if we want to use some of the money to persuade people to have an equity share in their own house—it may be half of what the Minister is planning to spend on refurbishing council houses—we are told that the money is in a box for decent homes and is not available for another use.

I hope that the Minister can understand the argument. I would love to see the Department sit down with Leeds city council, pool the money and ask whether its objective is to keep all the social housing in my patch or to give people the opportunity to move out. People are sitting on equity in their council homes, even if they have not purchased them. The scheme that we have worked on to allow them to take that equity and make a private house affordable seems a wonderful way forward. However, it needs the help of the Department and for it to be flexible about how the money is spent. That seems almost impossible. However, I want discussions on that to start.

The Government can build all the houses we need and want on the land that is cleared. They can say that they are available to everybody in East Leeds, but pricewise they will not be. I have dealt with one aspect of prices, but it is no use a couple going into a house unless they are working and have the income to keep it. That just leads to tears. The cycles of deprivation that have gone on for 30 or 40 years mean that there are still constantly high levels of unemployment in my constituency. The Government are needed. There is no sign of their involvement in the council's scheme, and I am not criticising the council for that. The council needs the Government as a partner.

We need a targeted system to help people to get skills and jobs so that they can take up the opportunities, which will be available. It will be bad for morale and will make some people angry if they see people moving into the new houses when they cannot. If we are about property and people, we should want to bring the colleges, the learning and skills council, Yorkshire Forward and each of the social partners together to devise programmes that get people appropriate skills and help them to find jobs in the booming economy. If we cannot do so in Leeds, I am not sure that we can do it anywhere, but if we do not do so in Leeds, that will bring questions to the Minister and me.

There is a need for partnership and proper involvement, and there is a desperate need for co-ordination. Other Departments are involved: the Department of Health, the Department for Work and Pensions, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Education and Skills. The Government need to participate as an active partner. The co-ordinating Department must have the confidence and the ability to liaise with other Departments. One Department will not solve the problem; we need many Departments to do it.

We need partnership and co-ordination, but above all we need money. I am talking not about fresh money, but about the money we already have. That money should be freely given to be pooled, by agreement, for all the social partners and the residents to go into the areas that best trigger the move towards our objectives.

Sometimes Departments come to the table and say, "We are all in favour of participating and we'll put our money in, but we'll decide what it is spent on. As long as it is spent on something that relates to our budget and our Department, we're happy." A real partnership, real joined-up thinking and working to meet objectives mean putting the money on the table, seeing what the budget is and seeing which areas, if the money is spent on them, will move us towards the objectives sooner. That would be a proper partnership and a real move towards meeting the objectives.

Some political input is desperately needed. There are problems. Leeds city council has to be convinced that the Government are willing to have a partnership, to share an ambition and even to raise ambitions for the council. That requires some political involvement. It would be useful to involve the three MPs whose constituencies are in the regeneration area—my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Colin Burgon), my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Hilary Benn) and myself. We should be involved and consulted. Will the Minister request a meeting with my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning so that we can agree objectives and start a dialogue that gets us moving towards the objectives?

For 30 years, I have seen council money and Government money spent on inner-city poverty. Despite all the national statistics, my area remains desolate. Spending money on individual initiatives, individual schemes, community centres—this, that and the other—merely dulls poverty; it does not abolish it. If we are putting money in, I hope that the Minister and the Department have the same ambition and vision as I do. We have been putting the money in for 30 years. As Hillary Clinton says, people are mad if they continue to put money in, do the same thing and expect different results. After 30 years, we are continuing to put money in the same areas, apparently for the same objectives, and we are surprised that nothing has happened. We have to do things differently.

I hope that, in the brief time available, I have given some ideas on how to do things differently, and I would welcome some enthusiasm from the Department for a partnership to end inner-city poverty in Leeds.

4.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) on initiating the debate. I shall return at the end of my contribution to his three principal points, which were about flexibility, joined-up partnership arrangements and a meeting with my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning. At that point, I shall outline what we have been trying to do, the partnerships that exist and what they are trying to do.

The Government recognise the description given by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East: the area includes a number of communities that continue to face problems of deep-rooted deprivation and disadvantage, despite significant neighbourhood renewal investment over a number of years. I note that he paid tribute to the past Labour leader of the council and to the present Conservative Councillors Carter and Carter—that sounds like the title of a Michael Caine movie. I am sure that they appreciate his expertise and support in trying to achieve their shared objectives.

The Government are determined to help to tackle the problems of our most disadvantaged communities. In 2005, we announced a further £1.3 billion package of assistance to help local authorities and their partners to narrow the performance gap between those areas and the rest of England by addressing the six neighbourhood renewal themes of crime and antisocial behaviour, education, housing, liveability, health inequalities and worklessness. Those are the exact issues that my hon. Friend said plague parts of his constituency.

The funding package comprises a £1.05 billion neighbourhood renewal fund, spread over two years, and a £265 million safer and stronger communities fund. From the national funding package for England, Leeds city council district will receive £27 million neighbourhood renewal funding in 2006–07 and nearly £15 million in 2007–08; £4,798,800 neighbourhood element funding between 2006 and 2010 to support the development of neighbourhood management in areas that contain some of the highest levels of deprivation; £2.1 million cleaner, safer, greener communities funding to deliver physical improvements to local public spaces; and £319,000 for community empowerment network funding for 2006–07 to support the strategic role of the voluntary community sector as a key partner in the local strategic partnership. A significant proportion of the funding will be applied by the local strategic partnership, Leeds Initiative, to support regeneration in the East Leeds area, and it should prove valuable in levering in other resources to the area, including European funding.

I am aware that considerable investment is planned for the development of an East Leeds link road to provide a strategic 4.5 km dual carriageway link, incorporating a high occupancy vehicle and heavy goods vehicle lane, between the Leeds inner ring road and the M1. That new road will create direct access from the M1 to the Aire valley employment area—a 400 hectare regeneration site of potential development land to the south-east of Leeds, which is already home to 400 businesses and 15,000 jobs. The construction of the East Leeds link road will enable a further 180 hectares of land to be developed creating up to 29,000 jobs

My hon. Friend will be aware that the Government's "Homes For All" five-year strategy set out the potential of mixed communities to transform persistently deprived areas of the UK. Quality and well designed housing, offering a mix of housing types and tenures attractive to a wider range of households, is critical to developing the long-term sustainability of communities. I note in particular my hon. Friend's comments about some of the oldest properties not being suitable for refurbishment, and the Deputy Prime Minister is regularly criticised by some who have not examined the pathfinder policy, for example. The only way forward is to demolish certain properties, but that is not at the expense of refurbishing appropriate ones. The Department has adopted a flexible approach.

As my hon. Friend knows, East Leeds is currently characterised by a predominance of social housing, as he described, which is mainly composed of council stock. The area is seen as unattractive to new households, despite relatively low house prices in the private sector compared with other areas of Leeds. Leeds city council established the east and south-east Leeds regeneration scheme to deliver a better housing mix. That initiative involves a ground-breaking public-private sector partnership aiming to transform East Leeds over the next 15 to 20 years, without additional public sector resources.

The council's use of its land assets will generate more than £1 billion of private sector leverage, delivering around 5,000 new homes. If successful, Leeds city council will consider rolling out their mixed communities initiative to other parts of the city. EASEL will create mixed-tenure neighbourhoods that are attractive to a wider range of households and ensure that proposals for each site are tailored to their market characteristics so that the long-term prospects of the area will be realised through market-led renewal. It will also include improvements to the design, fabric and management of the neighbourhood environment; promote the use of sensitive local lettings policies, which enable social landlords to create a better mix in communities, helping to address intense concentrations of deprivation; promote effective housing and neighbourhood management approaches to tackle deprivation; and link changes with action to reduce worklessness, poor educational performance and skills, crime and poor health.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has designated three areas as demonstration projects to test and share best practice in delivering the mixed communities policy. In Leeds, phase 1 of the EASEL initiative—for the Gipton area—has been designated as one of these demonstration projects, and work on clearing sites in Gipton for new homes is almost complete. The support of the people of Leeds, specifically the tenants and residents of East Leeds, is critical to the success of EASEL, something that my hon. Friend emphasised in his excellent contribution.

Leeds Initiative, Leeds city council and the East Leeds District Partnership are delivering ongoing consultation on the future of East Leeds, for example through the East Leeds District Partnership strategy and through the area action plan for East Leeds as part of the local development framework. That consultation has to date revealed broad support for the EASEL initiative, including phase 1 in Gipton. The LDF consultation is specifically seeking the views of East Leeds residents on options for the future of the area. The East Leeds District Partnership and Leeds East Homes arm's length management organisation have strong tenant and resident involvement at board level.

The area's retention of its existing communities is vital to the success of EASEL. Again, that point was central to my hon. Friend's contribution. Those communities have formed the fabric and history of the area over generations. Work to establish the future housing needs and aspirations of the community is under way. For example, consultation in Gipton identified high levels of ownership aspiration among council tenants. Housing market research for Gipton and Seacroft is also planned, as is a wider housing market assessment of the East Leeds area. That work will inform future plans and strategies, so that future housing mix policies deliver the long-term aspirations of existing communities in East Leeds.

In terms of the more immediate needs of tenants and residents in clearance areas, Leeds East Homes ALMO has put in place a dedicated support team that is visiting tenants and residents to support them in choosing their immediate housing options. A range of options for tenants and residents is now in place to enable them to remain in the area.

A recent review of Leeds city council's allocations policy has strengthened support for council tenants in clearance areas. Under the Leeds choice-based letting scheme, they are now placed in the highest priority banding, giving them equal preference to others in greatest housing need. Direct lettings policies are in place, and ALMOs will also have the option of ring-fencing some properties for clearance households. Work with registered social landlords has also resulted in some tenants taking up opportunities to move to RSL rented accommodation.

The ability of existing communities to remain in the area is of course dependent on affordable housing provision—rented and for sale—and appropriate packages to ensure that those wishing to purchase a home can do so. Local planning policies require that 15 per cent. of new housing in the EASEL area is affordable. That policy will be reviewed on an ongoing basis.

In EASEL terms, there is an early example of that policy in the phase 1 Gipton area. Leeds city council has agreed a local home-buy low-cost home ownership scheme in Gipton, so that residents who have had their homes cleared and cannot afford to buy one of the new homes in the area can purchase up to 50 per cent. of a new property, with the council owning the remaining percentage under shared equity. The scheme is funded from land sale receipts, and it guarantees affordable housing for future generations. That kind of policy will be built on to deliver affordable housing as future phases of EASEL are delivered.

I am pleased that Leeds city council is working closely with the ODPM and key regional partners such as Yorkshire Forward and English Partnerships to bring together housing and renewal strategies that make a lasting impact on the communities of East Leeds. My hon. Friend requested a meeting with my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning to discuss those matters and flexibility. As a result of previous discussions with him, I have spoken to my hon. Friend and she is more than happy to facilitate the meeting as requested.

Local area agreements are very much about what my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East describes as important in a partnership: co-ordination, and real partnership between Departments, those involved regionally, the local authority, and local tenants and residents, to ensure that we have the flexibility and prioritisation that local areas need.

I acknowledge the strong lead that my hon. Friend takes in promoting community regeneration. I applaud his determination to continue to improve the East Leeds area for all people who live and work there.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Five o'clock.

Honours System (Reform)

[Relevant documents: A Matter of Honour: Reforming the Honours System—Fifth Report from the Public Administration Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 212 and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6479.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watts.]

2.30 pm

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to be able to introduce to the House a report of the Public Administration Committee on the honours system. It is always customary to say that reports are timely, but in this case the report is particularly so. However, in a sense it would always have been timely. I shall quote from a report:

"There is no doubt that there have been for some time, and recently in increasing numbers, persons who, for want of a better name, we may stigmatise as touts, who have been going about asserting that they were in a position to secure honours in return for specified payments".

That is from the report of the royal commission on honours in 1922.

Honours matter. They are important. I shall quote only once from our report, at the beginning of which we stated:

"We take the honours system seriously, as a way in which the state seeks to recognise service and achievement that it values. This is an important function, which is why it deserves proper attention."

We continued:

"In particular, we consider that honours are not mere decorations; they are important symbols of what is valued in national life."

Last week I visited a youth club in my constituency in an area called Hednesford, which is an old mining area. Just behind the Florence street Methodist church is a building that is no more than a wooden shack, in which a 70-year-old ex-miner twice a week runs an over-subscribed youth club. He is also, by the way, the caretaker at the local school, where he acts as a general counsellor to the students. It would never occur to that man that he might be thought of for any kind of honour. It is work that he does because he thinks he should, because his God has asked him to and his civic consciousness drives him to it. I cite that example only because I came away from there thinking that if ever a man needed an honour, it was that man. That is why the honours system matters. It is a way for us to say, "This is the kind of activity that our society values." That is what the honours system should do.

If we cause that system to be contaminated by things that should not contaminate it, we of course devalue the system across the board for people, including the man I have described, who deserve honour. That is what happens. A confusion has always existed between honour as something that we should like to value as a society and honour as a lubricant of patronage—usually patronage associated with money. Those two ingredients have always characterised the honours system and caused difficulties.

As the first of my quotations suggests, there is nothing new about that. In case any hon. Member is minded this afternoon to try to make political points by describing the problem as a phenomenon of a particular period or Government, the merest glance at history is enough to sweep such attempts away. Our old friend Maundy Gregory, the only man to be convicted under the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925, was only one of the touts who engaged in the trade in the first part of that century.

It was said that Maundy Gregory would sell a viscountcy for £80,000 to £120,000 and a barony for £30,000 to £50,000, and that a baronetcy would cost from £25,000 and a knighthood £10,000 to £15.000. Lloyd George is estimated to have amassed more than £1.5 million in his private bank account from the sale of honours—that is about £150 million at today's prices. Between 1916 and 1922, 120 hereditary peerages were created, and more than 1,500 knighthoods were awarded.

It has been suggested that Gregory was paid £30,000 a year for his role as an honours broker. He continued to sell honours after Lloyd George's resignation in 1922 and after the 1925 Act was passed, splitting his spoils with a corrupt Conservative official, Sir Leigh Maclachlan, and Sir Ronald Waterhouse, Stanley Baldwin's private secretary, through whom he was able to get names on the honours list. He was caught after approaching Edward Billyard-Leake, a retired naval lieutenant-commander, and offering him a price of £10,000 for a knighthood.

Billyard-Leake reported Gregory to the police and he was charged under the Act. He was fined £50 and jailed for six months—of which he served two—in 1933. After serving his brief sentence in Wormwood Scrubs he was collected by car from Conservative central office before he could be rearrested on a murder charge, and was whisked off to a life of exile in France on an alleged £30,000 payment authorised by Baldwin; he died there in a prison camp during the Nazi occupation.

I put that on the record only so that we may remember where we have come from; and so that, when some people suggest that there has been a great falling-off in standards in public life, we can compare standards in public life at the beginning of the 21st century with what was taking place at the beginning of the 20th century.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): One of my predecessors as Member for Caernarfon, Lloyd George, took, in the 1920s, a very straightforward view of the sale of honours as a way of raising money for his political enterprises. Does not the contrast with today lie in the amount of pious claptrap about the exchange of honours possibly for political support? Is it not that hypocrisy and claptrap that brings the system into disrepute in the country?

Dr. Wright: I suspect that there was always hypocrisy and claptrap, but if the hon. Gentleman asks whether I think that things were more dishonest at the beginning of the 20th century than they are at the beginning of the 21st, I am in no doubt that they were massively more dishonest then. To bring the story a little more up to date, just for historical accuracy, when the Home Affairs Committee tried in the 1990s to produce a report on party funding, it broke down on party lines. The Conservative majority of the day refused to assent to a proposition that party funding needed to be investigated and reformed.

[Dr. Wright]

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Before my hon. Friend leaves that point—I give him credit for the extraordinarily deep historical research that he has undertaken—I want to refer to the large number of hereditary peerages and baronetcies that he mentioned. Is my hon. Friend aware of whether any of the original purchasers of those honours are still sitting in the House of Lords? If so, should not their names be more widely known?

Dr. Wright: That is a fascinating suggestion. I am surprised that members of the press, who are so assiduous on so many fronts, have not been assiduous in tracing the lines of descent from some of those characters who were given hereditary peerages all those years ago. It would be nice to see from where their claim to legislative authority derives.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Mark Thatcher was of course given a hereditary baronetcy by the former Conservative Prime Minister—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I do not think that there is any suggestion that Mark Thatcher's line of descent is anything to do with the argument.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. O'Hara. Surely, the title was given to Denis Thatcher, not Mark Thatcher.

Dr. Wright: Indeed it was. When the Committee took evidence from John Major, it was interesting to see the embarrassment that the insistence on awarding that baronetcy had caused him. There is a lot of murky history behind this issue.

I was referring to the Home Affairs Committee's failure to produce an agreed report into party funding in the 1990s. The minority report noted that "between the election of Mrs. Thatcher in 1979 and the 1993 New Years Honours, 18 life peerages and 82 knighthoods have been given to industrialists connected with 76 companies which have between them over the same period donated £17.4 million to the Conservative Party and its front organisations".

I well remember how we used to campaign on those matters. We used to have the list of Conservative donors on one side of the table and the list of peerages on the other. For the sake of historical accuracy, therefore, we must accept that the issue has been endemic in our political system for a long time and that we have resolutely failed to address it.

When we talk about honours, we must clear some considerations away.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman was able to go back only 100 years. Is he aware that the abolition of the Irish Parliament in 1801 was lubricated by a substantial number of United Kingdom peerages, which entitled Irish peers and some Members of the Dublin Parliament to sit in the House of Lords in the imperial Parliament?

Dr. Wright: I am grateful for that reminder. The danger of citing historical instances in which honours have acted as lubricants of the system is that we can offer endless examples to make the point.

There is something inherently and necessarily subjective about the award of honours. It is not a science, but an art, and although we should make it as sophisticated an art as we can, it remains inherently subjective. We do not know the motivations of people who do good works; we do not know whether they do them because they are good people or because they would like to get an honour and have worked out that their chances of doing so will be increased by doing good works. In a sense, it does not matter, and it is up to the honours system to make the subjective judgments that make the outcome seem reasonable.

It is sometimes said that people should not receive honours just for doing their job and that they should do something more to receive one. That might seem like a decent principle, but it, too, leads to complications. We might all want to honour someone whose job it is to find a cure for cancer even though they are just doing their job. Someone who scores the winning goal for England in the forthcoming World cup might just be doing their job, but they might be thought to deserve an honour.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that some civil servants might get an honour automatically? Is that acceptable?

Dr. Wright: Indeed it is not. A reader of our report will see that we deal quite vigorously with that issue and seek to strip out honours that have been reserved for civil servants. We say quite directly that civil servants should take their place with everybody else in the honours system and that there should not be a separate category.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I have been listening to hon. Members' exchanges and I wonder whether my hon. Friend agrees that the crucial point about honours is that they should be a reward for services to the nation, not dispensed by the state for services to it? Those two things are not synonymous.

Dr. Wright: Indeed they are not, and a well-honed honours system will take that on board when honours are awarded—as I said, such a system is inherently subjective, and awarding honours is an art, not a science. Sometimes, the two things that my hon. Friend mentioned coincide, but they will not necessarily do so. As I was going to say, a clever state might seek actively to use an honours system to cultivate the behaviours that it would like displayed, and it is perfectly proper for it to do so—that is a potent instrument. As I said, we do not know why people do things, and it is not improper for a state actively and imaginatively to deploy an honours system to reward the behaviours that the community wants.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that we owe some people a posthumous debt of honour for services of distinction to the nation? In our review of the honours system, we have an opportunity to ascertain whether a case can be made for someone of the ilk of R. J. Mitchell, who made such a contribution to the nation. We have an opportunity to take on board his son's concern that the nation still needs to award him an adequate honour for his innovation in engineering design and his invention of the Spitfire.

Dr. Wright: He was a Staffordshire man, and I am inherently well disposed towards awards for Staffordshire men and women, living or dead. My hon. Friend talks of a reformed honours system, but we do not have such a system. If we did, however, I think that we would find a way to consider such issues.

I have talked about some of the difficulties involved in sorting our the criteria, and Sir David King, the Government's chief scientific adviser, told us that the test was whether an honour added lustre to the award. That is probably the best test that we will get. Will giving someone an honour add lustre to the award and the honour itself? Many honours will pass that test, but some will not. When Harold Wilson was Prime Minister, he used to say that he did not like dull honours lists and that he liked to sprinkle a little stardust across them. However, a bit too much stardust has been sprinkled across honours lists, and there has been too much desire to ensure that there is a bit of celebrity recognition. The more we go down that route, the less lustre we add to the award—indeed, the more lustre we will remove. That is the nearest that I can get to a seriously objective test.

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend think that the refusal to accept an award adds lustre to the intended recipient?

Dr. Wright: There is an issue about whether someone makes their refusal public. I am not sure that there is anything terribly dignified about a public statement, although there is a certain dignity both in having an award and in refusing one. That is one of the considerations that informed our report, and I shall briefly say something about that.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): About 2 per cent. of awards are refused, but refusals by high-profile individuals grab the limelight. Some people in public life who are doing a good job sometimes refuse an award, but they are never mentioned—only those who sprinkle stardust and starlight on the system get any notice.

Dr. Wright: One reason why the issue has surfaced in recent times is that people feel uncomfortable with the word "empire". Indeed, the report gives some fairly telling quotations in that respect, and a number of people told us, "I come from a colonial background and have spent all my life struggling against colonialism." They are then expected to go around as a Commander of the Order of the British Empire. That is not a tenable position. When significant sections of the population feel that they cannot take on board the nomenclature of awards, that invites us to think seriously about whether we need to revisit the subject.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): As the now Sir Tom Jones might say, it is not unusual to find people who would add lustre to awards in the way that my hon. Friend suggests in every community, county and region of the country. The problem in achieving fairness and diversity is shown by the fact that 3,000 awards are made a year and there are 1 million people in Leicestershire and Rutland. One sixtieth of 3,000 equals 50 awards a year. Do that many awards go to the people of Leicestershire and Rutland, or indeed to any other group of 1 million? No, of course not. There is a distinct metropolitan skew to the system, is there not?

Dr. Wright: Indeed there is. As I am sure my hon. Friend has seen, the report includes a statistical appendix that gives some figures on the distribution of awards, not only by region but by other characteristics. One of the reasons for wanting a seriously reformed honours system is that those are exactly the considerations on which we would expect the honours system to report on a regular basis. We should be told how well those who run the system are doing to ensure that honours are distributed fairly across the population, including on geographical grounds.

Mr. Wills: My hon. Friend is extremely generous to give way so often. Does he agree that the metropolitan bias referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) reflects a deeper problem with the honours system, which is that it disproportionately rewards status rather than service?

Dr. Wright: Indeed it does. That is one of the fundamental issues. The clearest evidence is that the more senior somebody is, the grander the award that they will get. Although we have made some efforts in recent years to sprinkle some honours among head teachers and so on, that is still fundamentally the case. It is unsatisfactory because it reproduces a system of existing awards, rather than challenging that in the name of a different kind of honour, which would be given to people for work in the community, in particular. That has been increasingly understood.

I have had an interesting correspondence recently with a lord lieutenant, of all people. Lords lieutenant are seen as one of the routes into the honours system. He expressed his dissatisfaction with present arrangements, partly on the grounds referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire. There is widespread feeling that the time has come to revisit those aspects of the system. That was the point—I have finally arrived—of our report.

Reviewing the evidence, we took the view that it was time for a seriously radical reform of the system. That is why we made a number of recommendations. We have recommended that, in essence, we should take the honours system away from politicians and that we should have an independent honours commission. Ideally, that would be done as it was in Australia, with a great public debate about the honours system that we would like, exploring the issues that have been raised, and asking what we, as a society, want to honour and how we would like to do that. We could then convert that into an independent commission to do the work on behalf of society.

Mr. Prentice: Is it not the case that our society is still, in the 21st century, hierarchical? The honours system underpins that. Even today it would be inconceivable for a school teacher to be made a dame, or a police inspector to be given a knighthood.

Dr. Wright: As my hon. Friend will remember, we took the view that it was probably time to move away from what we call name-changing titles: knights, dames and the rest of them. In case anyone thinks that that is an outrageous suggestion, it almost happened in 1916, when an official committee considered all that and started to ask what a democratic honours system would look like and whether it would include name-changing titles. It would not, but that was not the view that won through.

Mr. Heald: Is not all this just denying our history? We have well-respected honours that people like, so why go into such a fever of anxiety and concern as though we were a new country trying to have a new system? We are not.

Dr. Wright: That is an interesting observation from the hon. Gentleman. If we consider the history of the honours system, as the report pointed out—

Mr. Heald: It is part of our history.

Dr. Wright: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has read the report. We deal with the point that the system is part of our history. It is a story of endless reinvention. We endlessly reinvent things and then claim that they are an integral part of our long, ancient history. In fact, the honours system has had two major periods of reinvention, the latter of which was in the first part of the 20th century and issued, crucially, the Order of the British Empire. That was an act of democratic reinvention at the end of the first world war, so there is no reason that we could not reinvent again a century on, as we have in the past.

Mr. Heald: The hon. Gentleman is right that new honours have been added to the overall package over the years, and he has just mentioned one of them. Is not the idea of scrapping all of them and having an order of British excellence, which was the suggestion of the Committee, just politically correct clap-trap?

Dr. Wright: There is only one thing worse than deliberate political correctness, and that is deliberate political incorrectness. There is no reason why we should not think freshly and radically about such matters without being accused of political correctness. Indeed, we were given evidence, which we took strongly on board, by John Major, who was a great advocate of what he wanted to call—as we called it in the report—the order of British excellence. He thought that that was exactly the right kind of organic evolutionary change, retaining the letters but adapting the award into a form that everybody would feel comfortable accepting.

We built on the suggestion, culled the number of awards down to four, and took account of the considerations of whether there should be separate awards for civil servants, concluding that there should not be. We think we have produced a proposal that takes the honours system out of the hands of politicians into those of an independent commission and is more sensible about defining the criteria for the receipt of honours and not just having them for people of higher rank or for people who are doing their job. We tried to define the basis of the system, removing the name-changing honours and having an honours commission that would report to Parliament on the characteristics of the honours system that have been raised by hon. Members, such as the people whom it represents.

Stephen Pound: My hon. Friend has been extraordinarily generous in giving way. I should say that when I was offered the Order of Merit, which I accepted with alacrity—it was the Order of Merit, officer class, of the Republic of Poland—I managed to maintain my objectivity.

Has my hon. Friend been attracted by the American system, where there are few national honours? The principal honour is the congressional medal of honour, and the filter is that it has to be approved by Congress. I am reluctant to look to the United States for example in such a way, but has my hon. Friend been attracted to the idea of an honour bestowed by Parliament with a transparent allocation process?

Dr. Wright: It might be that one category of honour could appropriately be arrived at by that route. Perhaps honours for particular purposes, which we could define, would be a creative addition to the honours system. I am not averse to such an idea in principle. Do I think that Parliament should create the honours? No, I do not, for many reasons.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): The report, which is an extremely good one, does retain some nomination rights for Government to the honours commission. Might not the danger be that that would suggest that the system was still about repaying favours and being partisan? If we are to include anybody with a political handle, would it not be better for those processes to be dealt with in a much more pluralistic way, through a Select Committee and Parliament as a whole, rather than through the Government of the day? Is not one of the main complaints that the system is overly party politicised? Is that not what we want to get away from most of all?

Dr. Wright: The distinction is between those who can nominate and those who make awards. It is perfectly proper for Departments to make nominations, because they are often the ones who know best what is going on. The key point is who receives the nomination and who makes the award.

While we were conducting our inquiry the Government set up their own inquiry under Sir Hayden Phillips, who is turning out to be a jack of all trades on such reform. We had a good relationship with Sir Hayden as he was making his report. He produced a report on behalf of the Government, which they later largely accepted, that took on board some of these points. His report said that all we needed to do was have more external people on the awarding committees and more transparency about who they are, and that that would produce greater public confidence in the system.

In that sense, the Government have responded to some of the issues and put in place their own reforms. My view is that the Government's response was a halfway house. It would have been much better to take a proper, comprehensive look at the whole system, not just to tidy up the edges that are causing difficulty at the time, as a mandarin might do.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The hon. Gentleman is kind in giving way again. His mention of Sir Hayden Phillips brings to mind the suggestion that only dukes should be allowed to chair royal commissions because only they cannot be rewarded for coming up with the result that the Government want.

Is the hon. Gentleman really suggesting that a committee would be more capable of providing an appropriate honours list rather than a list that would find widespread support? Is there not always a danger of committees being too conservative? The hon. Gentleman might dislike this, but Harold Wilson was at least adventurous in the way that he scattered stardust on the honours list. Other Prime Ministers may be so in other ways, but at least we can vote them out. We cannot vote out a committee.

Dr. Wright: One of the points about having a different system is not only to do with the mechanics of choosing the names. The bit that we do not do very well is the bit that gets under the skin of our society: finding the kind of people whom I mentioned at the beginning. The honours system hardly does that at all now, and it certainly does not do it well. We would benefit from a system that more actively took on board the idea of going and finding the people doing the work that we as a society would like to reward, rather than simply taking the names in from the usual transmission belts. That is the point about having a different system.

I bring my remarks to a close by mentioning propriety, which has caused some excitement in recent weeks. Interestingly, the Committee decided several months ago that it wanted to revisit its work on the honours system in relation to propriety. That is, how effective was the machinery at guaranteeing the integrity of the system? The issue relates to the scrutiny committees that were set up at the beginning of the previous century, the work of the commission that has now taken that on board and the way in which the scrutiny committee has been absorbed into the House of Lords appointments commission.

We decided to do that work long before the recent excitement, when things were calm. Since then, of course, there has been all the excitement. The appointments commission has raised queries about names. It seems from the reports in the press—I do not know whether they are true—that it did so the previous year, I think in relation to Conservative nominees, which put all parties on a yellow warning. The commission returned to the issue only this year, more actively querying certain names, because of that history.

One could say that that shows that the system is improving. We have had a political honours scrutiny committee since the early part of the 20th century. As we know from all the evidence, we have also had people appearing to receive honours and peerages because they gave money to political parties and sailing through quite serenely. We might therefore take some comfort from the fact that we now have a piece of machinery that is more energetic.

Someone said the other day that there should be a donor's Bench in the House of the Lords. People who sat there could wear special ermine and everything would be above board. We could go down that route, but it would not be the preferred route. It would be much better to try to clean up the system, so that honour did not flow just from money.

The central issue—on which the Committee reported in responding to the Wakeham commission report on the House of Lords—is a second Chamber that has a built-in confusion between being part of the honours system and being a legislative chamber, the second Chamber in Parliament. That confusion causes all the difficulty. People in society are not queuing up to be legislators in the second Chamber of Parliament, but they are queuing up to become Lords. Yet one is unfortunately indissolubly linked to the other.

Mr. Hendrick: Is it not indeed an honour to sit in the House of Commons, and are we not called hon. Members?

Dr. Wright: It is the highest honour in the land to sit in the House of Commons. It should be an honour, as a legislator, to sit in the House of Lords, but we should not confuse an honours system with serving in a Chamber of Parliament. They are different honorific activities.

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Was the hon. Gentleman not amused to re-read the passage in the Government's response to the report that says:

"In 2006 the Electoral Commission will have and make public information on political donations covering five years; the Committee's role in inquiring into donations will no longer be necessary"?

Dr. Wright: That is an interesting point. The argument was that transparency would take care of the issue; that is, because we had transparency—again, we have to give the Government credit for legislating on party funding—that role was not required. That was wrong. We need scrutiny of the higher honours too, not just of peerages.

I end by returning to the 1922 royal commission on the honours system, which said:

"It is repugnant to honest feeling that a person otherwise undeserving of an honour should get it simply because he promised to contribute so much to the Party funds".

That is the case and has been so for a great number of years. The problem contaminates the House of Lords and it contaminates the honours system. It is my contention that something must be done about it. That is why we have to reform the honours system, reform the House of Lords and reform the system of party funding, because they are all indissolubly connected.

Several hon Members rose—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I remind hon. Members wishing to catch my eye that the three Front-Bench contributions should commence no later than 5 pm.

3.10 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Tony Wright) on his introduction and his rather selective brief history. In summary, he said that the Liberal Democrats started raising money by selling peerages, that the Conservatives cottoned on and that the Labour Government have taken it up with great gusto. However, I do not want to make political points; I want to talk about a constituency matter. [Interruption.] No, I really do.

In essence, whatever the House does, we will never remove the suspicion that people are awarded peerages because they have given money to a political party. Does the Minister agree that the only solution, the only way in which such suspicions can be entirely removed, is to have a completely elected House of Lords? If we did that, there would be no question of patronage.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Does my hon. Friend not accept that patronage within political parties does not need to be oiled by money but can be oiled by other things such as gender, race, history, or other relationships to the more senior people in that political party?

Mr. Bone: My hon. Friend makes a good point, but I want to keep specifically to the question of honours and cash for political parties. We have reached the stage when we need a fully elected House of Lords.

Mr. Hendrick: What would happen if someone tried to buy a candidacy in a political party? Would the hon. Gentleman allow only those candidates that did not donate anything to the party in question to go forward?

Mr. Bone: I am saying only that we should have an elected House of Lords. We have reached that stage.

I hope that the Minister can answer my next point. I see no problem in someone who gives a large amount of money to an educational institution receiving an honour. The honour could be inscribed "For providing funds to improve education". However, it would be a problem if that person were then made a Member of a House that makes our laws. It is correct that those who give donations for public service should receive honours, but they must be described as such. However, I am not concerned about those who make donations but with people who, in my view, really deserve honours.

I have come across the problem twice in my political career. It first happened when I was in the Welsh valleys. The lady in question had worked for years on behalf of the Conservative party, almost single-handedly flying the flag. She had never wanted to go up the greasy pole and she had no personal ambition. She did it for what she believed in. I am sure that Labour Members know of similar people in their constituencies. I was asked to provide some background information with a view to that lady being given an honour. Unfortunately, she never received one. I would like to see more people like her receive honours.

That brings me to my main point, which is a constituency matter. I shall not mention the name of the person concerned, because that might be counterproductive. My predecessor as the Member for Wellingborough worked hard for someone who had done much to improve the lot of children in a very deprived area of Africa. My predecessor had supported an application for an honour, but nothing ever happened. He came to see me, the newly elected Member for Wellingborough, and asked me to support the application and to ascertain what had gone wrong.

I made inquiries and found that the person in question had been rejected. I could see no reason for the rejection, and I have supported a new application. It transpired that there is a limit to the number of honours awarded each year, and the category in question was limited to 1,000 awards. I find it hard to believe that there were 1,000 people more worthy than my constituent. Will the Minister say whether honours are capped, or are they determined on merit?

If he can, I would appreciate the Minister helping my constituent, who is extremely deserving, has spent years improving conditions for children in Africa, is well known locally and has had national recognition.

3.15 pm

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I begin by congratulating the Committee on an admirable, thorough, first-class report. I agree with most of it; it is constructive and it makes some important proposals for reform of the orders and the process by which such awards are made. I strongly associate myself with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Tony Wright) on the need for reform of the House of Lords.

The honours system does matter, partly because the recognition embodied in the awards powerfully motivates those who serve—a significant point made by my hon. Friend—as well as their colleagues. The system also represents what we value as a nation. It is an important component of our national identity. The report reflects the widespread feeling that although the honours system still fulfils that purpose, in some important ways it fails adequately to reflect our national identity as many would wish.

It is not a matter of individual awards, or even the sprinkling of stardust over each list. Ultimately, as my hon. Friend said, each award is subjective, and no matter how committees consider the honours system, that degree of subjectivity will remain. Rather, the question is about the overall balance of awards; what categories of individual receive awards, and why.

One issue goes to the heart of the question; it is fundamental to ensuring that the system properly reflects the values of the nation. It is how far the awards recognise exceptional achievement and exceptional service. If awards are given only in recognition of achievement, they could easily be seen as being little more than the privileged reinforcing their privileges—the great and the good establishing themselves even more firmly in the bastions of power and privilege. I hope that few people would think that such a process reflected something desirable in our national life.

Equally, achievement cannot be excluded as a criterion. I share my hon. Friend's view of Sir David King's remarks to the Committee. It is important that awards should shed lustre on the award as well as dignifying the recipients. Exceptional achievements can clearly help do that. However, in this admirable report and more widely, the tendency has been to conflate the honouring of achievement and of service as if they are synonymous. They are not.

Those who have achieved much in their lives may also have given great service to the nation, but it is not axiomatic. The report recognises the widespread dislike of honours being given to people for simply doing their job. However, I am not sure that it follows that a higher proportion of the higher honours should be given for service rather than achievement. When examining any honours list, it is hard to avoid the impression that awards for services rather than achievement are focused on the lower ranks of each order; the knights, the companions and the commanders are concentrated in the traditional ranks of the established classes.

The report includes the evidence of Sir Hayden Phillips, who said:

"Fifty years ago around 40 per cent. of all awards went to Crown servants . . . it is now under 14 per cent."

That is 40 per cent. of all awards. It is often instructive to examine carefully the use of language by civil servants and politicians.

The use of the word "all" drove me to look at the distribution of the higher awards. I read the summer list in 2005, and among the higher honours I counted 147 knighthoods and awards such as commanders and companions for various orders, of which, by my rough and ready analysis, 52 went to Crown servants. In other words, 35 per cent. went to the great and the good. When other categories of the great and the good are added to the equation, the proportion is far higher. That might not be surprising, but that does not make it acceptable.

Any honours system must use a sifting process. There are two stages in the process that might easily work against those who have given exceptional service, but have not achieved eminent status. First, there is a sifting by category and occupation. It is right, in my view, that there should be an attempt to reflect all facets of national life in rewarding achievement. Not to do so would artificially elevate certain activities above others. It is also clear that that will be a subjective judgment, which might shift to reflect changes in national priorities. For example, the Government are focused on education being a priority, and that has led to educationists appearing more prominently in the higher honours. Most people would agree that that change is welcome.

There will always be a tendency to reflect the most visible and powerful categories, not necessarily those who give the most selfless service to the nation. Some 200,000 people in this country work in social services. Those important, often thankless, jobs often require extraordinary dedication, but such workers are often punished and humiliated in the media when they make mistakes. They rarely receive public commendation when they get things right, and their jobs are not well paid. Yet how many social workers do we see in the upper echelons of the honours system every year? Does that imbalance reflect our core national values?

I do not say that businessmen and permanent secretaries should not qualify for such awards—of course they should—but I wonder whether they should receive them so disproportionately in comparison with the caring professions. I am not trying to elevate the status of the caring professions above that of business or that of the civil service. All can serve, but there should be a greater equivalence of esteem, and it should be reflected in the honours system.

The second institutional bias in the system against honouring service instead of achievement might flow from the difficulty of identifying recipients. Achievement and status, by definition, thrust themselves forward for recognition. Exceptional service divorced from status will inevitably be harder to identify, but that does not mean that we should not try harder to do so. Of course, that will be a subjective process. I feel humbled every time I see a teacher of children with special needs at work. Their selfless patience and dedication, often in difficult circumstances, can be extraordinary, yet how many of those teachers do we see represented in the higher echelons of the awards every year?

As I said earlier, my personal view is that the system is inherently subjective. If we had a system that genuinely recognised service rather than simply achievement, we would see, every year, among the knights, commanders and companions, not only the businessman but the social worker, and not only the head teacher—to pick up on a point that my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) just made—but the form teacher who has given selfless service over many years. We would see not only the head of a royal college, but the hospital cleaner. If that seems a strange proposition, it is only because the system rewards status more than effort. We can all think of genuinely selfless people who make extraordinary efforts on the part of others, yet whose status in society apparently renders them ineligible for the higher honours. I am talking not about the lower orders, but the higher honours which inherently reflect the value that we place on them in society.

Mr. Andrew Turner: I am a little confused by the hon. Gentleman's elision of status with achievement, as compared with service, because he has compared both status and achievement with service. In my constituency, there is a young lady in her twenties, I believe, from a working-class family in Derbyshire, who was made a dame because she was the fastest woman to sail around the world single-handedly. That is about achievement, not status. Can the hon. Gentleman tease those issues out slightly better?

Mr. Wills: I am happy to try to do so, but we are splitting hairs; it is a matter of semantics. The extraordinary sportswoman to whom the hon. Gentleman refers clearly achieved status as a result of her achievement. That does not mean that it is negligible; it is eminently worth while, and she is obviously eminently deserving of the honour that has been conferred on her. That is not in question. I have made it quite clear that that sort of eminent achievement, which is outstanding and extraordinary, should be honoured. Everybody would agree with that. We must have balance between achievement and service, but that is not always the case. What happens all too often in the upper echelons of the awards—I am not talking about the overall system—is that achievement is rewarded more than service for the reasons that I have given.

Mr. Hendrick: While I agree with my hon. Friend's analysis and many of his conclusions, I am concerned about how practicable his suggestions are. I agree with his distinction between achievement and status as against service, but are not there millions of heroes in this country working above and beyond the call of duty to be the type of people he is talking about? Would not it be unfair to many of them if only one or two were recognised rather than all of them?

Mr. Wills: Of course, my hon. Friend is right. That is what I meant when I talked about the difficulty of identifying such recipients. It will be problematic, and I agree that there are probably far more selfless heroes in the country than eminent footballers or rock stars of great established longevity who suddenly become eligible for such honours, or, indeed, permanent secretaries. We must consider this in relation to not only the individuals concerned, but what the system says about the nation. It is about what we honour as a nation; we are sending out a signal that we honour achievement and status more than service. We must find a way around that.

Any system will inevitably be subjective—my hon. Friend is right about that—but so is the current system. Why is one footballer or permanent secretary honoured rather than another?

Mr. Heald: The way in which the Government put it in their response—for once I rather agree with them—is that an individual who receives an award for service should have "gone the extra mile", and that someone who receives an award for achievement should stand out "head and shoulders" above his or her peers. That is rather a good way of summing up what we are looking for.

Mr. Wills: I agree entirely. My point is that both those considerations should be reflected in the upper echelons of the honours system, but they are not. If they were, we would see some of those millions of heroes being made knights, dames, companions and commanders. That would show that we reward and honour service at an equivalent level to achievement. Are we really saying, through the way in which the upper echelons of the system work, that the only people who go that extra mile—to use the hon. Gentleman's definition—are to be found only in the upper echelons of the civil service, in the royal colleges or among head teachers? Absolutely not—none of us believes that, yet the honours system appears to send out that message.

Mr. Hendrick: Suppose that a police sergeant were to be made a knight. Given that there are 43 police forces in England and Wales—I do not know how many there are in Scotland—[Interruption.] Eight in Scotland, I am reliably informed. Suppose that there was one knight in each of the 43 forces, plus the eight in Scotland, does my hon. Friend think that it might devalue a knighthood if so many were given out in one tranche every year?

Mr. Wills: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his contribution, but there is no question of inflating the number of honours given out; it is just a question of distributing them differently. I thought that my hon. Friend was going to make a slightly different point—one with which I have sympathy, because it is practical—about how conferring a higher honour on a police sergeant who had gone that extra mile would impact on his position in his police force, and about whether that would undermine the command structure in that force. That would be a practical issue. However, the fact that we think that that is a problem says much about how we think the honours system reinforces existing power structures. It should not be doing that; it belongs to the nation, not to a prevailing power structure. That is the point. It reflects what we value and honour as a nation, and therefore it ought to be separated from power structures.

Of course we should be able to reward achievement, but we should be able to do so at the upper echelons to show that we truly value those people who, in the words quoted by the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), go that extra mile. I would like the system to be extended in that way, but that would be enormously difficult to do, and I fear that my plea will go unheeded, because people who have reached the top of their profession expect an honouring in that sort of way. They will find it difficult to accept that people lower down the power structure should be honoured for their extra effort. However, I strongly believe that the system should be extended, because it reflects something important about our nation: the fact that it is one nation, and that we are all citizens, equal in each other's eyes, and should reward those of us who go that extra mile.

3.32 pm

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have this opportunity to comment on our Committee's report. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) on his excellent presentation and on the way in which he chaired the Committee's deliberations.

The report is very good, but it is a consensus report and does not necessarily reflect every view of every member of the Committee, so I want to raise one or two points. First, I take issue with the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), who speaks for the Conservatives. He asked why we do not just keep everything. There is a serious problem in Britain, in that we have not addressed equality. Some of the revolutionary societies that emerged from the 18th century, such as France and America, thought equality very important. If some of my political forebears, the Levellers, had been victorious within the Cromwellian armies, our society might be much more equal and egalitarian now, but unfortunately we did not win, and some of what existed before the English revolution carried on afterwards and was perhaps reinforced to some extent.

The report is absolutely right to suggest getting rid of all the honours, and having a simple, three-tier, single honour. That would parallel the légion d'honneur in France, which is a much more simplified system, and which has a feel of an equal society about it. Our system reflects our still hierarchical and unequal society. It is extraordinary. I have talked to colleagues from the continent of Europe whose countries have had revolutions, defeats in war, economic problems and all sorts of tribulations that we have not experienced. We have preserved in aspic all the structures of the past that they have got rid of. The current honours system needs, if not to be got rid of entirely, then radical reform, as we suggest in the report. It would be healthy for our society to consider things in a much more egalitarian way.

My concerns are about the involvement of politicians in the honours system. My hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) and other hon. Members rightly mentioned that. I suggested during the Committee's deliberations that we should remove the power of the political realm entirely from the honours system; it should be completely separate, with no involvement whatever by the Prime Minister in particular, and by the political powers in general. One simple way to achieve that would be to abolish the House of Lords. I have always been an abolitionist, although I have reluctantly had to concede that there will not be abolition now.

Some years ago, I went along to a so-called policy forum—our party has them, but the Conservatives do not, or perhaps they do; I do not know. The subject was reform of the House of Lords. Instead of us having rigorous debates and democratic votes, the subject was chosen for us. We went along to a meeting, and a chair came from outside—we did not know where he came from; he certainly was not elected. He was imposed. Someone suggested that abolition of the House of Lords should be among the things to discuss, but the chair said absolutely not, and that that was not on the agenda. Someone suggested that we ought to have a daring vote, just to test the water on abolition, but the vote was ruled out of order, and we were told we would have no vote. I was puzzled by that; I wanted one. Anyway, it seemed appropriate not to have a vote, given that we were talking about unelected politicians.

Abolition would be one way forward, and it would certainly remove the Prime Minister's power to appoint peers. If any appointments of that kind are to continue, they should be removed entirely from the political sphere. My view is that we ought to have a wholly elected House of Lords—a Senate or upper House, as we might call it. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) suggested the same thing.

I was slightly concerned about another point made by our Chair, my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase. He said that things are much better now than they were. Well, relativism only goes so far. Things may be better than they were, but they are still not as they should be. I should like to see the whole system entirely cleaned up. There may be a bit less corruption, political fiddling and patronage than there was, but that is not good enough. We have got to get rid of the system entirely. I want the concentration of power in our country—the centre of power is in Downing street—to be dissolved and spread more evenly through the political system.

Mr. Hendrick: Will my hon. Friend answer the question that the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) would not answer? If there were another elected Chamber, what would prevent people from paying to become political candidates in a political party, in order to gain a seat there? If that were stopped, the only valid candidates would be those who did not donate any money to that political party.

Kelvin Hopkins: Those are matters for political parties. A political party that had such obvious corruption within it would hopefully suffer at the polls as a result. I would certainly want my party, at least, to be a genuinely democratic party where the members select their candidates in a free and democratic fashion.

Mr. Bone: On that point, surely one could say that political parties could take money to allow people to become candidates for the House of Commons, but the hon. Gentleman's point applies: the public would throw that party out very quickly.

Kelvin Hopkins: Things are not perfect, and I would like considerable improvements in all parties, including mine, but I will not go into that, because that would be going wide of today's subject.

Mr. Hendrick: All political parties have a membership fee and rely on finance in order to carry out their day-to-day business. Surely a judgment needs to be made about how much is considered bribery, how much a membership fee, and how much a valid, non-prejudicial donation.

Kelvin Hopkins: When I first stood for selection in my party, we were not permitted to mention money at all. We could not even refer to support from organisations that might donate money, because that could influence the selection. The selection had to be based on one's political worth, and that is absolutely right. That is the way it should be.

I would like to touch on the issue of stardust. I am not persuaded that we should give awards that are seen to be media-friendly in order to gain a bit of credibility, perhaps, in certain areas of the sporting world or whatever. An independent commission should choose people for an honour—for a légion d'honneur, a CBE or an OBE—using recommendations from friends and whatever. It should not be seen to be saying, "Ah yes, we have got to liven things up a bit with a few pop stars and footballers." If such celebrities have done wonderful things for Britain such as making great donations or bringing great honour to the country, they can be considered along with other people.

However, in a sense, most people who are that famous, wealthy and powerful have had their reward. I want no more reward than I have had already. As others have said, being a Member of Parliament is the greatest honour, and it is bestowed not by somebody up there sprinkling stardust, but by voters who vote for us because they think us worthy of their support and of representing them. I am not keen on the idea of stardust either.

I turn to another aspect of the report. Professor Peter Hennessy talked about the honours system being "the lubricant" of the state. I was unhappy with that. In many ways, Professor Hennessy is admirable—he made some superb contributions to our deliberations and is extremely entertaining—but I did not agree with him on that. I was more persuaded by Yasmin Alibhai-Brown and Jon Snow, who talked about the potential for corruption in politics and were absolutely right.

[Kelvin Hopkins]

I would like to see the abolition of any kind of politics in the honours system and, in conclusion, I shall quote a great man. When I started my political activity, I used to go to meetings in Arthur Henderson hall, our local Labour party hall. That was a long time ago, and I never thought that I would one day read out Arthur Henderson's words in Parliament. Here, he discusses politics, money and honours:

"This system whereby financial assistance rendered to a Party is recognised by the conferment of an honour by the State is, in my judgment, deplorable, and discredits the honours system. It is a means of enabling the temporarily dominant political party to bestow special political power, through membership of the House of Lords, on individuals of their own selection, and it does not secure that the person honoured possesses any distinction except his title.

In a democratic country it is a distinguishing mark of the good citizen that he interests himself according to his opportunity in the well-being of the community. It is indisputable that public service of great value has been rendered by men and women whose thoughts have never dwelt upon titled reward, and in view of the difficulty of keeping the honours list pure, I do not believe that the abolition of political honours would in any way diminish either the volume or quality of the services given to the community by its citizens."

That was written 84 years ago, and it rings well today. I certainly support Arthur Henderson.

3.42 pm

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): It has been a great pleasure to listen to the debate, Mr. O'Hara. On purpose, I did not seek to catch your eye earlier because I wanted to hear the points made by those who were described quietly as "the usual suspects" just before the debate began. I cannot say to whom those words referred.

For the most part, the report is good. However, one or two points are fundamentally bad and detract from its overall value, and I intend to refer to those. From where did the Committee get its information? It is an honour to be asked to give evidence to a Select Committee, and none of those who gave evidence—including my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)—could be described as normal. So where did the information come from?

I recognise that there was lots of written evidence as well, and I do not know all those who gave it, but the list on page 68 is made up almost entirely of the great and the good. I accept that a fair sprinkling of politicians are perhaps not quite as great or good as the rest of the great and the good who gave evidence. However, it is hardly surprising that the Committee came to the conclusion that politicians—even the Prime Minister—are not the right people to hand out honours, but that the great and the good are. As I said in an intervention, the Prime Minister can be sacked—by Labour Members at the moment, or by the public later.

One thing that worries me is the conservative—with a small c, obviously—nature of the great and the good in this country. As I said, I think it highly unlikely that in 1966 or 1967, or whenever it was, the great and the good would have risked giving the MBE to the Beatles. However, Harold Wilson did that. He described it as sprinkling a bit of stardust. Perhaps that was foolish, but it was not the only foolish form of words he chose to use in his time. He said, "These people have achieved something and we believe that it should be recognised, not through money, but through the formal recognition of the state."

The award did more than add stardust to the list; it naturalised—that is the best word I can think of—the youth subculture of the 1960s and brought it into the wider culture of the state and the establishment. The knighthoods given to Tom Jones and Mick Jagger—belatedly, I admit—did the same. They brought them into the imperium, if you like. Those knights were no longer rebels against the establishment, but part of it.

I say in particular to the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) that one of the great virtues of the British honours system is that those who would be rebels can usually be brought in. That is why there has not been a successful revolution in this country since 1688. It is greatly to our benefit and good fortune as a nation that our systems evolve rather than being thrown up in the air, with a great deal of bloodshed, to land who knows where.

Mr. Wills rose—

Kelvin Hopkins rose—

Mr. Turner: The hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) wants to intervene. However, I referred to the hon. Member for Luton, North and shall give way to him first.

Kelvin Hopkins: The hon. Gentleman's analysis is incorrect. We have not had revolutions in Britain because, in time, Governments have bowed to the will of the people and created a more civilised society. We have, particularly in the 20th century, been less repressive or oppressive than some other societies. After the second world war, a magnificent Labour Government created the welfare state and redistributed income and wealth as never before. That is why we have not had revolutions—Governments have given way, sensibly, to the demands of the people.

Mr. Turner: A combination of things is involved, including elements of co-option, naturalisation and good rule from both major parties for 100 years.

Mr. Wills: I am curious about the hon. Gentleman's argument. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins), I balk at it; I have a different understanding of history. The hon. Gentleman was describing what many analysts would say is the approach of the Government of China at the moment—co-opting every possible rebellious and talented individual into the system as an alternative to democratic reforms. Is he endorsing that process?

Mr. Turner: I have insufficient knowledge of the workings of the Chinese Government, who are considerably more repressive than most Governments in the west.

Simon Hughes: Last year, we saw for the first time the names of the chairs of the eight sub-committees that recommend honours. What comment does the hon. Gentleman have on them? I shall quote from the list:

"Arts and Media: Lord Rothschild, OM, GBE . . . Community, Voluntary and Local Services: Lord Newton of Braintree, OBE . . . Economy: Sir John Collins . . . Education: Dame Alexandra Burslem, DBE . . . Health: Dame Carol Black, DBE . . . Science and Technology: Lord May of Oxford, OM, AC . . . Sport: Lord MacLaurin of Knebworth . . . State: Sir David Cooksey".

There is not a single unhonoured person among them. It strikes me that those who get into the system ensure that it runs comfortably for them.

Mr. Turner: I do not deny that. I do not think the system perfect, but I question whether the new system proposed in the report would be any better.

Dr. Wright: I am slightly puzzled by the hon. Gentleman's remarks. He said that he thinks all the people who gave evidence to us are in some way abnormal, which I thought curious when I studied the list again. Leaving that aside, if he were to read the report, he would see what we explicitly said:

"The commission . . . should not become simply a receptacle for the Great and the Good."

We point out how such a situation can be prevented.

Mr. Turner: The road to hell is paved with good intentions. I am sure that the Committee's intentions are perfect, but no committee in the world will not eventually be taken over by the great and the good, at whatever level. The great thing about the Prime Minister and politicians taking responsibility for these things is that they can be sacked. Sooner or later, the public usually sack them.

I shall move on from the composition of the list of witnesses. The excursion that I would most describe as a waste of time that rather devalued the report relates to the Order of the British Empire. The excursion was silly and it devalued the argument. Of course, some people object to the British empire, which was, on balance, a huge force for good in the world. However, people also object to saints and organised religion—some might even object to garters. I do not understand why the Committee feels there is a need to change the name of an order, when its function is to remain substantially the same.

I understand why people jib a little at the Order of St. Michael and St. George, but it has changed significantly over time from having its previous function to having its current status as an award for foreign affairs. The Order of the Bath has changed significantly over time. We have a range of different orders and they have different histories. I am sure some will fall into disuse, as the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India and the Imperial Order of the Crown of India did in the previous century.

Other orders appear to be dormant and are resurrected. In the most recent case, Sir John Major resurrected the baronetcy, which we all thought extinct but which had merely gone into dormancy. For the benefit of Labour Members, particularly the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), although he is no longer in his place, a baronetcy does not entitle one to a seat in the House of Lords. The suggestion that merely by changing the name of an order we are doing anything other than tinkering at the edges is silly.

Kelvin Hopkins: I am puzzled by the idea of the British empire being a force for good in the world. About a third of my constituents come from countries that fought hard for their independence and did not see the British empire as being benign in any sense. In fact, such people were often oppressed by it. Let us consider areas such as Iraq. The mischief that the British empire caused there is still affecting us today.

Mr. Turner: Well, clearly we did not do so much mischief that such people did not want to come to this country. Let us reflect on Africa: other places that were parts of the British empire are thankfully governed rather better, but most African former colonies are governed far worse than when they were part of the British empire.

I think that I have covered the point about the Order of the British Empire.

Dr. Wright: The hon. Gentleman must take on board the powerful evidence that the Committee received from Sir John Major on that issue. He explained why he no longer held the view that he previously did. He used to believe in what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but he has changed his mind, saying

"I believe it is now out of date".

He now thinks that a new order of British excellence is the way to proceed. He said:

"This is minimum change for maximum effect."

I would have thought that was a good Conservative principle.

Mr. Turner: First, we are not talking about minimum change. Minimum change is no change.

Simon Hughes: That is not change.

Mr. Turner: I am sure I could devise a more minimal change than changing one word in the order's title. Secondly, the proposed title is grey, although that is a matter of opinion, as is whether the title is appropriate and whether one individual or another should be a given a particular honour.

I accept that this is subjective, but I read that the order of British excellence was thought to be a better title than the order of Britain—I cannot remember which paragraph that claim was made in. I do not see the order of British excellence, which I think is grey in the extreme, as being any great improvement on the order of Britain, which was apparently rejected. Sir John Major has been right and wrong about a number of things. Sometimes he has changed his mind and become more right, and sometimes he has done so and become less right.

Mr. Hendrick: When the hon. Gentleman makes reference to the description "grey", I am unsure whether he is referring to the OBE or to his former Conservative colleague.

I was not particularly sensitive about the nomenclature proposed or whether it was any better or worse than using the word "empire". However, when I heard the hon. Gentleman's description of what he felt about that word and why he felt it should remain, and his view of the empire, my mind might have been changed. We might need to bring things up to speed in the 21st century.

Mr. Turner: I am pleased that I can have such influence.

Kelvin Hopkins: I shall make a simple point. We can see a conservative point to keeping the same letters—there is continuity with the past. People who have received the OBE, CBE or MBE would not feel affronted that their awards were disappearing and others would feel that they were getting the same letters after their name. Most people in my constituency who get such awards think that they get them from the Queen, our Head of State. Irrespective of what one thinks about the monarchy, when they collect their award at the palace, that is what makes their day.

Mr. Turner: I have no dispute with that fact. Such people get their awards from the Queen—from the Crown—not from the Prime Minister.

I find something else extraordinary. This is not in the report, but it is implicit in this debate that being knighted somehow makes someone a more important person. One just has to read Alan Clark's diaries to realise that it is not a title or a name that makes one a gentleman. I think that the phrase he used to describe someone whom he clearly did not think of as a gentleman, my noble Friend Lord Heseltine, was that he "bought his own furniture". I am sorry to say that I never knew Alan Clark, but I am sure he would have thought even worse of people who bought their own peerage.

I am not advocating any change to the arrangement of titles. I appreciate the point made by the hon. Member for North Swindon about the distinction between achievement, and service and status. I am proud that Dame Ellen MacArthur received the award that she did as a result of her extraordinary achievement. I do not think that people should receive awards merely for the status that they have achieved. It is sadly implicit in some of the awards given to permanent secretaries that they got them because of the status they achieved, although there is achievement in achieving such exalted status.

It is difficult to understand how it would be possible to measure service on a scale—even service that goes the extra mile—in the same way as we can measure achievement on a scale. We can measure achievement; we can see whether something is the best. However, it is very hard to measure the service of someone who has, for example, run out-of-school clubs for 25 years in a rural primary school. That is clearly service, although it is clearly additional service, but how can it be measured on a scale? For that reason, we should appreciate the token nature of the award—I am sure recipients appreciate that—and we should also recognise that not everyone can receive the award.

There is no equality; let us get away from the idea that there can ever be any equality in honours. There is no entitlement to honours, there should be no expectation of honours and, certainly, there can be no equality of honours, but there is the chance of recognition at a higher level than the local level. It would, of course, be better if more people contributed locally by putting names forward to those who make the decisions—whoever they should be—about the award of honours.

Simon Hughes: I realise that this is a controversial proposal to come from those on the Liberal Democrat Benches, but presumably the hon. Gentleman would not justify, in this modern century, the fact that the wife of a man who gets a title—a knighthood, for example—immediately gets a title, whereas if a woman gets a title there is no reciprocal arrangement? Surely, the person to be honoured should receive the title, but other people in the family should not automatically be honoured just because they happen to be hitched to somebody?

Mr. Turner: Legally, such people do not get a title; they get an honorific. The title of the wife of a knight or baronet—or, indeed, of a peer—is not legal; it is honorary. The fact that the husband of somebody who is honoured does not get a title is merely a matter of custom in this country. However, even if that were not the case, I would not see any need to fiddle around with this matter—it would be fiddling for no purpose.

I have a brief final point to make about the spread of honours. There is a metropolitan bias in the distribution of honours, and the further up the honours tree we go, the greater the bias becomes. I do not wish to delve too deeply into peerages, because reform of the House of Lords is not a matter for this debate. However, it is of concern to me that almost half the peerages—it might be more—granted since 1997 have gone to people who live in London. That is an extraordinary, ridiculous and unjustifiable bias.

I believe that the figure might be 40 per cent., but the fact that those people are involved in the legislature makes this an even worse bias. Sadly, it is reflected in the higher levels of honours throughout the system. That shows the failure of the establishment to co-opt people in other regions as successfully as it does people in the south-east. I wish it would make an effort in that regard, and encouraging nominations is the best way to do it.

4.3 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): A lot of ground has been covered, so I shall be brief.

The Committee's report was published in 2004—two years ago. We said:

"There was little if any evidence of the sort of serious corruption which at one time affected the system".

Of course, nowadays it is impossible to pick up a newspaper without reading some lurid allegation about the honours system—honours for sale, and so forth.

Let me say at the outset that I believe that the state should honour citizens who merit that. We set out in our report six principles for an effective honours system. The first of them is excellence;

"It should reward outstanding and exceptional service or achievement, at all levels".

Who would disagree with that? The second principle is integrity;

"it should not be, or be seen to be, corrupt".

We all agree with that. The third is transparency;

"it should be as open as possible, consistent with the need for confidentiality as to individual decisions".

The next principle is dignity;

"awards should be widely accepted as worthy".

The fifth principle is clarity;

"it should be easy for the public to understand why awards are made".

Finally, there should be fairness;

"it should not favour, or appear to favour, any one group".

We formulated those principles after taking evidence from a number of eminent people, and after acquiring a huge amount of written evidence, which is published in a separate volume. We got a lot of coverage. I truly believed that, with a Labour Government with a radical agenda, the honours system might be radically changed.

Alas, that was not to be the case. Many of our report's recommendations were rejected. We called for the ending of honours going to people just for holding a particular post—for example, to senior civil servants such as permanent secretaries. That was rejected. We called for the end of the Order of the British Empire. That was rejected. We have heard about the conversion of the former Prime Minister, Sir John Major, but there were also other people who felt the same way about the idea that we should still award people with the Order of the British Empire in this day and age, when that empire no longer exists apart from half a dozen or a dozen islands scattered around the world. It was simply felt that that was something that should be changed.

Benjamin Zephaniah is one of a number of people who refused an award. He declined to become an Officer of the Order of the British Empire; he stated—I wish I could say this in rap, but I cannot, and Members would laugh at me if I tried—that he believed it stood for colonial brutality and slavery. That is Benjamin Zephaniah's view. We felt that this could be updated. We felt that the initials could be kept; that is minimum change, which is the kind of change the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) likes. We felt we could keep the initials and just substitute "excellence" for "empire". We also recommended the phasing out of name-changing titles—the dames and the knights. The Government rejected that. It was rejected as too radical.

I believe—I have always believed—that we in Britain live in a very hierarchical society. When I intervened earlier on my Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright), I do not know if I said something that I did not mean to say, so let me say what I wanted to say again; I said that it is inconceivable that a teacher—not a head teacher, but a teacher—should be made a Dame of the British Empire. I just do not think that that would happen.

Simon Hughes: I think that has happened a few times; I think that three head teachers have become dames.

Mr. Prentice: I am not talking about head teachers. That shows the confusion; it is on the record now. What I am saying is that it is inconceivable that a teacher should become a dame, or that a police constable or sergeant should become a knight. How ridiculous is that?

Kelvin Hopkins: There is an interesting example that confirms that point. In the television programme "A Touch of Frost", Frost has won the George medal, and he hides it in his desk for fear of embarrassing his seniors. Is that not typically British?

Mr. Prentice: Indeed. I have made this point, and it is not an eccentric position for a usual suspect.

I have an article by Andrew Adonis, who has been a recipient of patronage—am I allowed to say that, Mr. O'Hara? He is now Lord Adonis. He calls for the abolition of name-changing titles:

"The Prime Minister should make no further recommendations of any titles which change people's names and forms of address."

However, that recommendation just disappeared into a big black hole. We still have the knights and the dames. Within the space of a few years, people would get used to the idea of having an honours system without name-changing titles. When Professor Cannadine gave evidence before us, he said that an honours system without titles would not be unworkable. In our report, he said:

"One hundred years on, if there are no titles in this country nobody will ever imagine what it was like to have had a system where they existed".

Getting rid of titles is no big deal. Other Commonwealth countries have got rid of name-changing titles, and why cannot a radical Labour Government do something like that? But it is not going to happen. The idea was rejected.

Another recommendation that we made was for an independent honours commission—rejected out of hand. The Government accepted some of our recommendations. We recommended that citizens who were honoured by the state could wear a little lapel pin. It is good that the Government accepted that recommendation.

We talked about categories: first, the people who accept honours, and, secondly, the people who refuse honours. There is actually a third category: the people who accept honours but do not describe themselves according to that honour. The classic example is Simon Jenkins, the celebrated columnist, who does not allude in print to the fact that he is a knight.

I want to spend a minute or two on those who refuse honours. This information is in our report. The Channel 4 broadcaster Jon Snow refused an honour. He is against name-changing honours. The Independent columnist Yasmin Alibhai-Brown returned her MBE, and she openly talked about how honours could be secured. It is a fact of life that many people would give their eye teeth for an honour. When the former Prime Minister came before us, he told us that when he was Prime Minister, he was "shocked at the extent to which . . . people were prepared to lobby for Honours".

That was the former Prime Minister being shocked.

There are people who have refused honours, such as the actress Vanessa Redgrave. Albert Finney, David Hockney the artist, Aldous Huxley the celebrated author, James Meade the economist, and Richard Lambert the former editor of the Financial Times, all reportedly refused an honour.

Mr. Hendrick: When I intervened on my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright), I made the point about refusing an honour. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) believe that an honour should be refused because an individual disagrees with the way in which it was awarded? Or does not he think, as I do, that many honours are refused either to gain publicity or to look anti-establishment, or just because people wish to be remembered for not accepting an honour, rather than remembered not as well for accepting an honour?

Mr. Prentice: My Friend must learn to think better of people. As I understand it, Vanessa Redgrave did not go public in saying that she had refused an honour.

Mr. Hendrick: She certainly would not now. My hon. Friend has done it for her.

Mr. Prentice: It was a leak from somewhere in the system. It is in the public domain.

Kelvin Hopkins: On the same point, Michael Foot, Jack Jones and others refused peerages on principle, because they did not believe in a second Chamber. They did not believe in a House of Lords, and they stuck by their belief and demonstrated it by refusing peerages when they could have had them easily.

Mr. Prentice: The simple point that I am trying to make is that if we had an honours system that followed the six principles set down in our report, I suspect that few people would reject it. I am just surmising; there is no way of knowing. It is because the present system is so opaque and there is no clarity about who should be preferred over someone else that many people think it is—I hesitate to use the word—corrupt, with a small c, and do not want anything to do with it.

We have made reference already to the hereditary baronetcy that John Major conferred on Sir Denis Thatcher. However, what has the recipient of that patronage, Mark Thatcher—just looking at the six principles, Mr. O'Hara, because I see you frowning at me—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. Absolutely not. Not this time.

Mr. Prentice: What has Mark Thatcher done? Well, we know what he has done; we read about it in the papers all the time. But what has he done to warrant that honour?

I want to touch on the question of propriety that was alluded to by my Friend the Member for Cannock Chase who chairs the Committee. A historian of great renown took us way back to the early years of the previous century, but the Committee on Standards in Public Life also had something to say about it. As it happens, we had the chair, Sir—Sir!—Alistair Graham, before the Committee only this morning. When the Committee on Standards in Public Life published its fifth report in 1998, it said:

> "Abuse of the honours system by the promise of an honour in exchange for a contribution to the funds of a political party has undoubtedly occurred in the course of the twentieth century."

People should not be shocked; the Committee was just stating the obvious. What has happened over recent years, however, is quite breathtaking. There are people who say that the sale of honours is now almost brazen. When Simon Jenkins came before our Committee, I asked him whether he thought honours were for sale, and he said that that he thought they were. Tom King is a Privy Councillor and former Secretary of State for Defence, with a long and distinguished career in government and in the Conservative party. I asked him whether he thought that honours were for sale, and he thought they were.

Many people believe that honours are being traded in the marketplace. We have on the statute book the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925, which was introduced in response to Lloyd George's sale of honours. The Prime Minister was asked only a couple of months ago, in January, whether he believed that the 1925 Act should be reviewed or reformed, and he said that he did not believe so. There has been one conviction—in 1933. Only one conviction.

Now we are in a quite unprecedented situation whereby the police have initiated an inquiry to see whether any actions have been taken that contravene the provisions of the Act. It is totally unprecedented. Members of the Public Administration Committee have already met, in camera, Deputy Assistant Commissioner Yates, who is in charge of the investigation. We will see him again next month.

I asked the Prime Minister a question at Prime Minister's questions in February. That was after the revelations in The Sunday Times when Mr. Smith was caught by that newspaper's sting. Believing that the reporters might be potential sponsors of city academies, he told them that if they sponsored a few academies, they could get a knighthood, and that if they sponsored a lot of academies, they could get a peerage. Mr. Smith was arrested, but he pleads his innocence and the police are no doubt investigating all that.

I asked the Prime Minister in the House of Commons Chamber why it is—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I think that it should be pointed out that no charges were laid.

Mr. Prentice: I understand. This matter is not sub judice. There are no charges; I will make that absolutely clear. I think that I said Mr. Smith was arrested. If I said that he was charged, I withdraw that, because it is not the case.

I asked the Prime Minister why so many people outside the House believe that it is possible to get an honour for sponsoring a city academy. Then I asked whether that was because six people have been honoured already. The Prime Minister, instead of replying to the question, said that I should visit a city academy and see the good things that happen in city academies.

We know from The Observer on 16 April that a direct link is now admitted between the sponsoring of city academies and the awarding of a peerage. That admission has not been contradicted or withdrawn by No. 10 and there has been no clarification, so as far as I am concerned, until I hear to the contrary it stands. The headline is "No 10 admits link between school donors and peerages". The strapline underneath is "Blair wanted greater political support in House of Lords for his controversial education policy". The article quotes an unnamed senior Downing street source:

> "What we wanted was people with expertise in academies as working peers, taking the Labour whip, who could actively contribute with a massive amount of knowledge to the debate on education in the House of Lords."

It is not right that people should be ennobled because they support a particular policy objective of the Government of the day. That is separate from supporting a wider public good. The mere fact that someone supports a city academy is not sufficient reason to put them in the House of Lords so that they can argue the case in the House of Lords as to why city academies are a good thing.

When I was reflecting on that, I thought, "If the new Blair doctrine stands, what happens when there is a change of Government?" I know that it is not Conservative party policy at the moment, but let us imagine that a future Conservative Government wanted to encourage the growth in grammar schools and were looking for wealthy people to endow new grammar schools. Let us imagine that that Conservative Government made it clear that people endowing new grammar schools would be in line for an honour. There would be uproar among Labour Members.

What about the private sector moving into the NHS? The Government have a policy objective that up to 15 per cent. of the NHS should be handed over to the private sector for delivery. Would it be right for honours to be awarded in those circumstances? I do not think so. There are questions to be asked and answers to be given. I do not want people dancing around the issue as though it does not matter; they should be clear and up front about all these things.

I want to finish on a point that takes me back to what my Friend the Member for Cannock Chase said; it is in the report as well. We need to separate out the awarding of honours from membership of the legislature. It is corrupt—again, with a small c—that people can end up here, legislating for the nation, making the laws of the nation, because they have been elevated as a result of being regarded as people who deserve an honour. That is one reason why I am very much in favour of a small, directly elected House of Lords. That was not the position of the Select Committee. I changed my position in order that consensus could be achieved on the Committee, but I believe that an elected House of Lords is the direction of travel. As a result of all the controversy and everything that is now spilling out, we are on track for an elected House of Lords.

The last time we debated the issue, the Prime Minister famously torpedoed the Leader of the House, the late Robin Cook, by saying, in the week of the vote, that he was in favour of an appointed House of Lords and against an elected House of Lords. He has now changed his position.

The report is good and well worth reading. It took us a long time to put it together but, two years later, the recommendations are still ones that the Government should follow.

4.26 pm

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I came here this afternoon to make a specific point but, having listened to the debate, I would like to make one or two general observations before I do so. The first point was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) in the opening speech. Inevitably, the debate on the honours system is linked to two other debates taking place at the same time: the debate on House of Lords reform and the debate on party funding. There can be no doubt that individuals' views on those two issues inform and determine to a certain extent their attitudes to the honours system and how it should be used. Obviously, if there were a fully elected House of Lords, the issue of nominations for peerages and political interference in peerages would go away.

Mr. Andrew Turner: In his closing words the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) suggested that there should not be a link that gives people who are honoured a place in the legislature, and the hon. Gentleman has just made a similar suggestion. Does he accept that the problem is more that the Prime Minister wants to put people in the legislature and, as a side issue, they have to accept an honour? That is how the process works as far as the money and the legislature are concerned. There may be people who are prepared to pay for an honour, but would not be willing to sit in the legislature.

Mr. Bailey: I am not sure that I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. The point that I am trying to get across is that if the House of Lords question were resolved, one of the issues about reform of the honours system would go away. Questions that have arisen in the debate about the role of those who fund parties and party policies might well also be resolved as a result of concluding that debate.

It is unfortunate that people with strong views—perhaps completely legitimate views in the other two debates from the one in which we are taking part today—use language that could sully and undermine the honours system. I have heard today words such as "patronage" and "corruption", and inevitably when such words are used—I accept that they are used more in the media than in this Chamber—there is a danger that the thousands of people throughout the country who have earned honours for meritorious service will feel that their own contribution is demeaned.

Kelvin Hopkins: It is not the accusation of corruption that demeans the honours list but the fact that people may be given honours for making vast payments.

Mr. Bailey: That is entering into another debate. The point that I was coming to is that I see no problem with a system in which people are nominated for honours by a political machine. That brings me to another point. If political organisations have the right to nominate people, the ultimate selection should be made transparently by an independent body. To a certain extent we have moved towards that and in the debate so far that point has not been given sufficient recognition. We are in danger of ending up in a position in which we as politicians demean our own profession and contribution to the community by saying that people may be nominated for almost any other service in any other profession but not if they are politicians.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) made a legitimate point about a Conservative party worker who had made a lifetime contribution. We should recognise that politics, for all its failures, is an honourable profession and that there is nothing underhand, corrupt or illegitimate in nominating someone for contributing to the political and democratic structure in society. It is a good profession and is recognised throughout the world. People play a role and there should be an avenue by which they can be honoured without accusations of patronage or corruption. There should be a process within the honours system that recognises and legitimises that and is protected from the wild accusations that appear in the media and are sometimes made by people with good motives who misinterpret the position.

Kelvin Hopkins: I profoundly disagree with what my hon. Friend is saying. People are not fooled; they know what is happening and they read about it in the newspapers every day. The simple process of taking the awarding of honours out of the political system would solve that problem once and for all. That is what we are suggesting.

Mr. Bailey: I listened to my hon. Friend's speech, but did not intervene because I profoundly disagree with him.

Mr. Hendrick: I agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's argument and that of the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) who said that politicians may be sacked, because the public can throw them out. The so-called great and good—or independents—often have their own agenda and are accountable to no one. I am not encouraged by the so-called independents to whom one or two of my hon. Friends have referred. I have heard today's debate from the beginning and I believe that one or two of my colleagues would be reluctant to make some of the statements that have been made here today if they were outside the House without parliamentary privilege. The way in which they made them was sometimes irresponsible.

Mr. Bailey: I agree with the thrust of what my hon. Friend said, but I am not sure that I would have made exactly the same observations.

In general, when upholding the honours system, its fairness, integrity and so on, we must be careful not to demean our place in our community and democratic structure or to devalue the contribution that many of us make.

An interesting thought occurred to me when we talked about people being honoured for charitable work. Given the way in which the honours system aspires to reflect positive values in society, most people would say that that is good. The debate about a tangential issue—party funding—has referred to political parties becoming charities, so would financial contributions to them provide a democratic and legitimate basis for honouring people under the honours system? All sorts of conundrums could be thrown up and we could have a long debate on that, but my central point is that there is nothing wrong with the involvement of politics in the honours system so long as it is transparent and the final selection is made by a body of people who are not party political.

Dr. Tony Wright: I find myself in agreement with much of what my hon. Friend says. Surely the point—there is no conundrum about it—is that political service is a good thing and we should value it. Giving financial support to political parties is a good thing and we should value it. What we should not have is a system under which people can buy themselves an honour by giving money to a political party. There is no conundrum about that.

Mr. Bailey: The point that I was making is that an independent body that is divorced from the political process should determine whether someone should receive an honour. There should be a legitimate political nominating process but the selection process should be independent. Presumably an independent panel would not make such a selection on party political grounds or because of a contribution made to a party political organisation. I do not think we disagree substantially on that, but I may not have made myself clear.

There is a gap in the report, although under the terms of reference it might not have been thought appropriate to consider it. It was recognised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley), who has now left the Chamber. There is an inability in the present honours system to recognise the contribution made by people who are now dead. The rationale for the honours system is that it is based on community values, and my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase said in the opening speech that honours are important symbols of what is valued in public life. He also said that it was legitimate for a Government to use the honours system to promote certain values in the community. I believe that that, in essence, is what my hon. Friend was saying. Honours may reflect the values of society, but they also promote them, because they uphold those who exemplify such values as things to be followed and to inspire others. I believe that a number of people who are now dead should be honoured, because they would fulfil that purpose.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North mentioned R.J. Mitchell, who designed the Spitfire. I too have someone in mind: a person from West Bromwich who exemplifies the sort of qualities that should be recognised publicly and have been recognised by other countries. Hon. Members present might have signed an early-day motion that I tabled approximately one year ago to honour Madeleine Carroll. For the benefit of younger Members, including the Minister, I should explain that Madeleine Carroll was a film actress. She was born in 1906, and this year is the 100th anniversary of her birth. She grew up in West Bromwich, the daughter of a French teacher in the local grammar school. She was one of the first female graduates of Birmingham university and was therefore a pioneer in female education. She taught French in local schools, then decided to become a film actress. She starred in the first version of "The Thirty-Nine Steps" as the lead opposite Robert Donat, in "Secret Agent", Alfred Hitchcock's follow-up film in 1936, and in many other films. She was Bob Hope's favourite blonde.

In 1941, Madeleine's sister was killed by a bomb in London during the blitz. Thereafter, she devoted her life to working for the Red Cross in field hospitals in France and Italy, and subsequently for the United Nations as a spokesperson, supporter and propagandist on behalf of UNICEF. If anybody wants to read an inspiring speech, I suggest that they read her contribution when, in 1949, she became the first ever female to speak at the international conference of the Rotarians. She spoke about UNICEF and the work that she was doing with children and refugees, many of them severely damaged as a consequence of the war.

Madeleine's contribution was recognised by the French with the légion d'honneur and by the Americans with the medal of freedom. I wrote to the Cabinet Office to ask that she be granted an honour and was told that posthumous awards could not be made. She exemplified the very qualities that we have spoken about today for underpinning the honours system: excellence—she was a world-class, iconic actress of her day; sacrifice—she experienced at first hand the horrors in field hospitals during the second world war; and service to others—she took up a cause that was hugely important but totally unrecognised in the immediate aftermath of the war. Surely the Minister will recognise that such a contribution should be acknowledged and that there should be within the honours system the flexibility to be proactive in singling out people who have made a huge and genuine contribution and who are inspirational figures.

Unusually for me, I shall refer to Lord Hurd's evidence to the Select Committee. The report stated:

"When honours recognise truly distinguished service or outstanding achievement, they can inspire real enthusiasm, reinforce public pride in achievement, and 'make the country feel good about itself' in the words of the Wilson Review. This is particularly noticeable when honours strike a chord with local or regional loyalties."

This honour would strike a chord with local and regional loyalties, as those qualities that I mentioned are essential to enabling deprived urban communities such as those that I represent to give young people values to uphold, recognise, follow and be inspired by. I ask the Minister, please, to look at that issue. I hope that Madeleine's contribution can be truly recognised and that her role in inspiring young people in areas such as mine will live on in their aspirations.

4.45 pm

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): I am pleased to be able to contribute to this debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) and the Public Administration Committee on the report. During the time that it was being put together, I was successful, after three attempts, in securing a debate on the honours system in January 2004. When I first applied before the Christmas recess in 2003, I was told by the Table Office that questions on the honours system were answered by the Prime Minister and that, because my right hon. Friend does not respond to Adjournment debates, it was not possible to have such a debate. Thankfully, that difficulty was overcome, and I am delighted that we have a fully competent Minister here today who can respond to this debate.

I share the anxiety about an apparent lack of clarity and openness in the honours system, and, like many other Members of the House and the wider public, I have some concern about those living in our communities who richly deserve the wider recognition that the honours system could bring, but who have never been honoured.

I pointed out in my previous debate that in December 2003 The Sunday Times ran an article on a secret document leaked by a Whitehall whistleblower. Apparently, the minutes of the main honours committee revealed

"the government's obsession with spin and rewarding Labour sympathisers".

I asked at the time, and I believe that The Sunday Times should also have asked, whether the system had ever been different under successive Governments.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) mentioned 1966, or 1967, and the fact that an award was given to the Beatles. I wish to remind hon. Members that awards for purely party political services were discontinued in 1966, but the policy was reversed in the premierships of Edward Heath and Margaret Thatcher, and Sir John Major continued the policy of awarding political honours.

It would be wrong for me to say that no attempts have been made to address the problems in the system. My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase went as far back as Lloyd George, and this afternoon we heard all the sorry tales about the honours system. History is marked with such situations. If anything has remained the same, it must surely be the anxiety and uncertainty about the system.

The 2001 review by Sir Richard Wilson considered how the nomination system had developed during the 1990s. A dedicated nominations unit was established and a standard nomination form produced. Perhaps one issue on which Sir John Major and I will agree is that the system needs to involve more ordinary members of the public, which would thereby

"help increase the recognition of merit of all kinds."

In fact, if there is a common theme on which the majority of people would agree, it must surely be the need to bring the honours system far closer to the people.

In recent years, there has been a fairly significant shift in the percentage of awards to those who dedicate so much time to voluntary work. In the 1994 birthday honours, only one in three awards was given for voluntary service. Thankfully, the figure rose to much nearer the 50 per cent. mark during the next 10 to 12 years, but, if I am absolutely honest, I would much prefer it to increase even more. I would like awards to those dedicated, local people who work in their communities to move closer to the 75 or 80 per cent. mark. If we were honest about having a reputable honours system in this country, that would happen.

Kelvin Hopkins: One suggestion I made to the Committee was that all the honours ought to be for ordinary, unrecognised people, not the famous, the powerful and people of status.

Mr. Brown: I agree with my hon. Friend, at least partially. I am sure that we can all recount tales of those working in our communities, whether they work with carers organisations or young children, or whether they are from wealthy or deprived backgrounds, or are disabled. People might have put in many long hours of work for 20, 30 or 40 years, bringing smiles to people's faces and providing community facilities that otherwise would not exist. We have heard such examples this afternoon.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) raised the important point that no one seems to know what happens once an application or nomination is made. It seems to go into some sort of black hole, and sometimes it comes out in a positive manner. If it is refused, no one ever knows why, and that has to stop. People need to know where a nomination is in the current system.

The report brought up a number of points. I notice that my predecessor—Lord Monro of Langholm, formerly Sir Hector Monro—felt that the role of the lord lieutenant should be more significant:

"Much more weight in the CBE-OBE-MBE area should go to the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant."

He went on to say that he "had 34 years of experience as an MP and had an excellent relationship with successive Lords Lieutenant. The frustration at the few awards accepted by the Scottish Office was obvious. The Lords Lieutenant know more about local affairs than Civil Servants."

I do not disagree that lords lieutenant know more about local affairs than civil servants, but none of us knows absolutely everything about our communities.

I hesitate to add support to my predecessor's recommendation; in fact, I voice my objections to what he says. I have spent 20 years—11 as a councillor and nine as a Member of Parliament—working in local communities. I know a lot of people. I have had good working relationships with lords lieutenant, but I am not convinced that we should put more emphasis on their views in the selection of people who receive awards through the honours system.

Much was made of Benjamin Zephaniah's refusal of the OBE in 2003, which was mentioned this afternoon. It became clear that refusals are not uncommon. I mentioned earlier that an average of 2 per cent. of nominations are refused on a fairly regular basis. It has become clear that the process of selection for successful nominations needs much greater local involvement. I am keen to see local panels established to assist in the process, perhaps moving thereafter to a committee of senior standing—to use a loose term.

Many relevant points have been made this afternoon about our honours system, the second Chamber in the Palace of Westminster and how we should fund political parties in the future. Some people will say that those are three separate issues, but others will say that all are intertwined. I believe that they are, but in 2006, we need to move towards resolving each of the three issues.

As I did in 2004, I want to make it clear that my congratulations go to all the recipients of honours over all these years. I know that some people are in the system for far longer than others. Some of our sportsmen and women and celebrities—whether they are in the field of art, film, television or whatever—seem to be able to jump through the system far quicker. I have no regrets about that, and I congratulate everyone who has received an honour. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) talked about six principles. He and I might disagree on those—I might have six different principles—but they come down to two things: openness and accountability.

I close by again congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase on this report. I am slightly disappointed that the Government have not responded more favourably. I agree with Sir John Major about the need to dispense with the "British empire" element, and I am wholly behind the idea of an order of British excellence. We live in a modern society; we should be treating and rewarding people in a modern way.

References have been made to the British empire. It has a history, of which we in this country can be proud, but it has also had some dark days, which bring offence not only to those in far-flung places, but to some of us in the UK. We need to move towards British excellence rather than British empire.

4.56 pm

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I am happy to take part in this debate. I am also happy to say that I have never previously taken part in a debate on this subject in the 23 years I have been a Member of Parliament. That may reflect the fact that it is a fairly esoteric subject in comparison with the mainstream issues affecting our constituents every day. It is not something that people come to our surgeries about. I say in passing that one thing that has been unsaid, but probably implied, is that those who ask for honours the most are the people least qualified to receive them. Such people certainly exist.

This debate testifies to the benefit of the Select Committee system. I sense that, in this Parliament, we are moving away, as others have done, from the plenary, general debate as a way of holding Government to account, and towards the Select Committee system as an ever-more strongly effective way of doing so. I welcome the fact that the organisational structure of Government is becoming clearer. The Cabinet Office is a slightly anomalous Department and has had a slightly anomalous recent life, although that is no fault of the Minister. In future Government reshuffles I hope that some logic is applied to departmental order, instead of just to accommodating people anywhere. The Department for Constitutional Affairs is the logical place to deal with the issue of honouring people, if civic society is to be well organised.

Although the subject may not be a central issue of British life, it commands a lot of interest for reasons of which everyone present is aware. I would like to subscribe to the common theme everyone has enunciated, which is that there are three core issues before us. As the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) made clear, it has taken two years for this report to gestate into a current political issue in the wider polity. There are three linked issues: reform of the honours system, reform of the House of Lords and reform of party political funding. They are absolutely interlinked, and I am glad that they are all on the agenda.

If there is a judgment to be made of whether people support the Select Committee proposals or those of Sir Hayden Phillips, I am clearly in favour of the Select Committee's recommendations. Its radical approach is the right one. It is not the Minister's fault, but I am disappointed that the Government have given such a lukewarm response to it. I sincerely hope that the Minister will be positive about the fact that we need a significant move forward to get the honours system right for the new century. That does not mean that we do not recognise the value of those who have been honoured in the past, or the past honours system.

There is no inconsistency in saying that it might have been appropriate for someone to receive the Order of the British Empire in 1920 or 1950, but that it is not appropriate in 2006. That does not devalue what people have received; it means valuing what people are now, in a modern society. I hope that that is clearly understood. Whatever we might think of the way that honours have been given in the past, just because there is a proposal that there should not be automatic honours for certain people in the services or for people in certain diplomatic missions—and there should not be—that does not mean that some who got those honours in the past were not deserving of them for doing a specifically good job in the services or the diplomatic service. I am not nervous about saying that we should move on. In my book, it does not collectively undermine the people who have been honoured in the past. That should not be an argument against change.

We have got into a terrible muddle constitutionally. People should not be put into a legislative House of Parliament as an honour, but to legislate. That is the only justification for being there, and getting there is itself an honour, and I hope that we will reach a conclusion. We will have the debate about the reform of the House of Lords. I have always had a clear view that it should be predominately elected, although I think that there might be space for nominated people, for obvious reasons, in a non-partisan way. People should not be put in the House of Lords as an honour; they should be there to take part in the legislature of a modern British constitution. In that case, it probably should not be called the House of Lords, but the senate, the second chamber or the upper House. There are plenty of perfectly modern phrases that could be used to describe it.

The options are an honours commission, a set of committees and sub-committees that are chaired by people with honours, however eminent they are, and the lords lieutenant doing their job. I have met a few lords lieutenant in my time. They may be good and honourable people, but I have never had the impression that they are representative of the common people. They seem to be of a particular background and type, by and large.

Kelvin Hopkins: Very rich.

Simon Hughes: No. For example, the lord lieutenant for Greater London is Lord Imbert, the former Metropolitan Police Commissioner. He is a relatively unusual lord lieutenant in terms of background and pedigree, and is well respected throughout Greater London. By and large the lords lieutenant are not necessarily the people who would be most capable of knowing what was going on and who were the right people to be involved.

I support the idea of an honours commission to which people can make nominations, including political parties and the rest. We can discuss how it will be formulated. I agree that it should not be a quango, so that we end up with all sorts of people who are already eminent.

There is a truth in what the late Anthony Sampson said both in his original "Anatomy of Britain" and in his last book, written just before he died. If one looks for where the power lies in Britain, one discovers it in a small number of places with a small number of people, disproportionately concentrated on London and the south-east and among those who know the others who have power and influence. We have an opportunity to break out of that circle and to honour the people in our communities.

The hon. Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown) is right. Honours are more valuable and important in local and regional communities for people who are respected from the bottom up, rather than those who are spotted as valuable from the top down. Such credit is given, on occasion. Gary Stannett, a guy in my constituency, got an MBE for his youth work integrating disaffected kids who are difficult with really good kids, and making sure that we have a much more effective way of dealing with antisocial behaviour. He is about 30, and has done valuable work. He would never have dreamt for a moment that he would have ended up with an honour for that, but just did that work from the time he left school.

There are some difficult issues about how to get the balance right. I share the view about volunteers who carry out community service, as other hon. Members have mentioned. Some public servants should be honoured for going above and beyond their call of duty. Of course, people should not get an honour just for doing their job, but if they do their job particularly well or excel, that is justification—whether they are a teacher, a school keeper, a head teacher, a school governor or anybody else. The community beat police officer who had never wanted to be promoted would be another example.

We should not bestow additional honours on those of us who are honoured by getting through the democratic political process. Councillors, Members of Parliament Members of the Scottish Parliament, and so on, are honoured by virtue of their posts. There should not be additional honours for having got there in the first place. Those people have plenty of rewards and I hope that we are clear about that.

[Simon Hughes]

People in the public sector who perform over and above the call of duty should be honoured; so should many in the voluntary sector. Those in the private sector who do more than line their own pockets and make profits, but who contribute as innovative entrepreneurs should of course be honoured. People in the political sector who are not elected should also be honoured. I can think of people who have worked for political causes—cross-party, no party or party causes—who deserve to be honoured. They are the sort of people whom we all know, who have never sought elected office but have worked for no reward for political causes, voluntarily flying the flag—I am not trying to be partisan, but for the Tories, for instance—for years in an area where their party has been little represented. Many people ought to be rewarded for such contributions to public life and for ensuring that democracy works. They should not be excluded.

I want to make one other plea. Team awards, such as the Queen's awards for industry, are often not recognised as being of the same merit. The Queen's awards are about the only recognition of that kind. I nominated a local charity, XLP in Southwark, for a Queen's award for the voluntary sector, which it got. XLP was hugely deserving of the award and was pleased. Such an award does not offer a financial benefit, but I hope that we might award corporate awards to sports teams, other teams, the voluntary sector and business, as well as personal awards. There seems to be scope for those.

I have a clear view on the question of OBEs: we ought to make the proposed change. The order of British excellence seems a simple and easy way forward, and a comfortable transition. If we could unite around that, that would be helpful. I like the idea of extending the Companion of Honour and getting rid of all the knighthoods. It is a little like the middle ages still to be giving people knighthoods. Let us pause to think for a minute about knights and dames—it is like a cross between Robin Hood and the pantomime. I am not disparaging people who have those honours, as that was what was available at the time, but we ought to move on and have a more modern system.

I made the point earlier that if somebody who is married is made a knight, their other half gets a handle. That does not work the other way around, which seems bizarre, ridiculous, sexist and old-fashioned. There ought to be more attention to diversity. It is getting better. The commission would need to be diverse, and it should be particularly attentive to diversity. I am talking about diversity in terms not only of gender, ethnicity and religion but of geography. That is important. There has to be an attempt to ensure that the honours system reflects the fantastic diversity of this country and its traditions, as well of all four countries of the United Kingdom and their traditions.

The last point that the hon. Member for Dumfries and Galloway made is absolutely true. People nominate people, fill in forms and expend a lot of effort. Sometimes they approach MPs and ask whether we will nominate someone, and we do so. Nothing more is heard. As far as I know, that has not changed. Whichever system we use the answer might be no, but somebody should get a courteous letter telling them that their nomination has been considered and that although the person might be very worthy nothing can be done with the nomination at the moment, as well as advising them to feel free to nominate somebody in future. At the moment, it is a sad end to an effort to recommend other people. Such changes would be worth while.

I thank the Minister for listening. I hope that he will go away and talk to his colleagues and even to the Prime Minister. I hope that he will say, "Prime Minister, as part of your legacy, you are going to do all these things. You are going to reform the House of Lords, reform party political funding and sort out the public services, which would be wonderful. But let's also get the honours system sorted. Be bold, be brave, be radical and we will end up with a good honours system that is robust and fit for the new century."

5.9 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I congratulate the Committee on its report. We are indebted to it for such a detailed piece of work, but, as the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) said, it is a shame that it has taken from its publication in July 2004 until now for us to debate it.

Quite a lot has happened since the report was published. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the recent scandal—or at least public concern—over cash for peerages. The police are investigating the matter, so it is perhaps not for me to go into the detail. However, what has appeared in the media has alarmed the public, so it is right that we should also consider the issue in the context of Lords reform and reform of party political funding.

I agree with the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) that we should have a second Chamber, upper House or whatever one wants to call it with a substantially elected element. I also agree that there is a role for some appointment, but substantial election would help with the package of issues that we are discussing.

The Conservative taskforce, which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) is chairing, is looking at a range of constitutional issues, including those three. My remarks will be coloured somewhat by the fact that he might make recommendations that we shall want to consider as seriously as we do those that the Committee has made.

The Committee's report is good on how one might want to improve the procedures, and the Government have gone some way in meeting its points, but the disappointing thing, which received some publicity at the time, is the controversial idea of ending appointments to the Order of the British Empire and phasing out knighthoods and damehoods, and replacing them with an order of British excellence. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) was my party's spokesman on the subject at the time. He described the proposal as a lot of trendy nonsense and a recipe for a "bland and boring" system.

It is right to have proper procedures and to get away from political nominations, but to deny our history and to pretend that we are a young country with new ideas and that we have to forge a new constitution, which seems to be the politically correct idea behind the proposals, is a lot of nonsense. We are an ancient country and we have a lot of ancient traditions. People like honours, so why be a party pooper? The Committee has got that wrong—subject, of course, to what our taskforce says.

The Government have done well in their response, saying that the Order of the British Empire continues to play a well-understood and, in terms of numbers, predominant role in the honours system. They point out that 120,000 people have one and say:

"A number of existing members of the Order have said that they would be dismayed if there were serious moves to stop new appointments to the Order now, or in some other way to show that it had no continuing place in the life of the nation."

The Government alighted on the common sense of the situation, and I am glad that they decided to opt for continuity and tradition rather than radical upheaval. I also agree with their conclusion on knighthoods, which they are right to say play a "well-respected, understood and valued part in our national life."

We have had a good debate today, and the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) made about people who have made a lengthy contribution to political parties locally was well taken. A lady in my constituency who has worked for the Conservative party her whole life has been awarded an OBE. In terms of encouraging people to participate in politics and make a difference, it is good to set such people up as role models and say, "Here's somebody who has devoted their life to a cause they believe in. They've tried to make a difference and this is something that is good for our nation." Of course, that applies equally to other parties.

I do not want us not to honour people in the political field, but I agree with my hon. Friend that the foot soldier who goes the extra mile should be recognised. [Interruption.] I hear a comment, sotto voce, about that also being true in Scotland, and I agree. My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) also set out some important principles, and some excellent points have been made from all parts of the Chamber.

It is right that we should take a more proactive approach to seeking out those who merit an award. There is probably an element of truth in the point about metropolitan elites, so if we can move to a process that finds the people in the region or locality who genuinely deserve to be rewarded, we should. It is fair to say that John Major, who has been mentioned, started that process. He was committed to trying to spread the honours and to encouraging awards for people who had made a notable contribution locally.

The Prime Minister's announcement in March that he would give up the right to nominate people for honours—the so-called Prime Minister's list—is to be welcomed. That is also something that the Committee recommended. We support the Prime Minister's decision, although wonder why he chose that moment—perhaps it was just convenient for him. Members of the Committee will be aware that other changes have been made. I do not want to go through them all, but the Government have moved somewhat.

What should the principles be? The first principle must be that honours should be based solely on merit. As has been said, they should not simply be a reward for long service. The Government said that, for long service, the question should be whether a person has gone the extra mile and, for achievement, whether they stand head and shoulders above their peers. That is a good way of putting it, and it is also a point that John Major has always made. In his 1992 review, he was keen that merit should be the touchstone. There has been a considerable increase in the honours awarded for voluntary work since then, and the proportion of state servants in the list has fallen from 20 to 15 per cent. over that period. John Major can be proud of having started that process, but there is a lot more to do.

Secondly, the system must be free from any corruption, or even the appearance that there might be an element of corruption. I hope that we can do more on that.

Mr. Heald: Someone who donates to a political party should not be debarred or disqualified from receiving honours, but should merit the honour in their own right.

The Committee was rightly particularly strong on the question of maximum transparency in the system, and I have paid tribute to John Major's work in that field. Honours play a key part in our national life. They provide colour and embody some of our best traditions as a nation. I agree with the Committee that there is a case for improving the procedures that underlie the system for nominations, and for adding awards from time to time, but I hope that the Committee will accept that its more extreme proposal is, perhaps, best forgotten. We will see what it says in its latest report.

Finally, I should mention the Duke of Edinburgh award scheme, which has united the nation and helped young people. The scheme, which provides an example of the best parts of the honours system, is 50 years old this year.

5.34 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Jim Murphy): I am delighted to have this opportunity to respond to the debate, which has been remarkable in its tone. That is probably down to the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) introduced it; he helped to influence its tone and content. I do not think that it is controversial to say that, at times, it has been more of a conversation than a debate, which is not a bad thing.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries and Galloway (Mr. Brown) without whose perseverance I would not have the honour of responding to today's debate on behalf of the Prime Minister. I think that we all congratulate him on that.

We are short of time in our deliberations this evening, but I, like other hon. Members, want to pay tribute to one outstanding individual in my constituency: the Rev. Ernest Levy, MBE. In the nine years that I have been in Parliament, my proudest moment was hearing that he was to be honoured, because I nominated him. The reason why I nominated him—more than once—was that he survived seven concentration camps and then dedicated his entire life in Scotland to encouraging reconciliation and promoting dialogue between people of the Jewish, Christian, Muslim and other faiths. He has visited hundreds of schools throughout Scotland, and continues to do so. His case is one of the many fantastic examples of an honour being rightly awarded.

I turn to the issues raised today. If any hon. Member feels that I have not responded to all of the local points that they made, I will happily write to them, if encouraged to do so, with more substantial and specific responses. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) asked about a constituency matter. I confirm that the list submitted to Her Majesty is limited to 1,000 names per annum. That is the established upper limit on names that can be submitted. By custom and practice, Her Majesty takes a personal interest in literally every one of those nominations, so that is considered to be the appropriate number to enable such genuine involvement and engagement from Her Majesty.

The hon. Gentleman quite rightly did not mention the name of his constituent, but requested that I should take some interest in the case. This is quite a difficult issue, in that some hon. Members say that we should have more political involvement and some that we should have less. It is therefore difficult for me to promise to fast-track any application, because that would be inappropriate. If the hon. Gentleman wants to identify the individual concerned to me outside of our deliberations, I will certainly ensure that all the relevant processes are followed appropriately. That is the right thing to do.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), who is no longer present—I know that he cannot be with us—raised a point that was followed up by other hon. Members. He asked whether awards should be for service or achievement. A related issue in which I am most interested and have taken a keen interest is the way in which that affects the gender balance, or imbalance, in our awards system. If awards are given simply for achievement or position in a society in which, despite substantial progress in recent decades, position and power are still disproportionately allocated between men and women—if we reward simply status and people who have held official positions—the system will have an in-built bias towards men. However, there has been some important progress in that regard in recent years, as we have increased the emphasis on awarding honours to those who work in public services and the voluntary sector.

An important point that many have picked up on is the need to award the higher honours to those who work locally but who act as examples nationally. That is the distinction that the Government draw; we are talking about local action from which people can draw national inspiration. For example, 49 teachers were on the new year honours list of 2006. Hon. Members have spoken about head teachers; only one has been made a dame. Some 20 per cent. of honours go to those in the health service and education, and almost 40 per cent. of awards go to those working in local services and the charitable and voluntary sectors.

5.39 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

5.49 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Murphy: With your agreement, Mr. O'Hara, and with the understanding of hon. Members and the Chairman of the Select Committee, I shall make some brief comments and then write to everyone who attended, entering into specific points and responding to practicalities.

I have two quick points to make before I finish. We were asked about diversity. A Cabinet Office leaflet encouraging take-up has been distributed to post offices and libraries across the United Kingdom. It makes the point about diversity and is about making the system more accessible. I do not believe that it is in our post office here in the House of Commons, and I am not sure whether it is in our Library; that is a gap, and we will make sure that that is put right as a consequence of today's debate, and that that publicity is there.

Finally, I thank hon. Members for their attendance and their thoughtful contributions. I particularly thank the Select Committee and my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries and Galloway, to whom I referred earlier. Today's debate is part of a general evolution of the system of honours and of the political process, and our debate and the Select Committee report is part of that. Centuries of evolution, and recent decades of progressive change, can and should continue. We have heard the possible agenda for that future reform and evolution today. With that, I thank you for your perseverance this afternoon, Mr. O'Hara.

Question put and agreed to.

Latin America

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. McAvoy.]

9.30 am

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the profile of Latin America in the House. There is growing interest in Latin America among Members of both Houses, as evidenced by the attendance that we have had at some meetings of the all-party Latin America group and by the increasing number of groups being formed for individual countries in Latin America.

It is timely to focus on the strategy of the Department for International Development, because my understanding is that this year, 2006–07, DFID will review its regional assistance programme. It has certainly promised to do that. Initially, however, I shall talk about why Latin America is important and why DFID and the Government in general should be interested in it. It is sometimes said that Latin America is not a traditional area of influence for the UK. We have relatively little in the way of former colonies or territorial interests in the region, and some of the old pre-war links—we used to build quite a lot of infrastructure there—are not what they were. However, it would be a major mistake to marginalise our interest in Latin America, and I shall give five reasons for saying that.

The primary reason for DFID being involved in Latin America is that 57 million people there still live on less than $1 a day, and 132 million people live on less than $2 a day, amounting to 26 per cent. of the population. The aim of DFID's strategy is to contribute to the achievement of the millennium development goals. However, even the best current projections for 2015 are that Latin America will fail not only on the poverty measures that I have just mentioned, but on maternal mortality, infant mortality and HIV/AIDS outside Brazil. All too often, it is the indigenous and black people of Latin America for whom those targets are least likely to be met.

With the exception of Nicaragua, the countries of Latin America are classified as middle-income countries, albeit Bolivia and Honduras just creep into that category. However, the point about the countries in that part of the world is that they are extremely unequal. Half the world's 20 most unequal countries are in Latin America. That has an effect on crime: half the world's 10 most violent cities are in Latin America. We may be dealing with middle-income countries, but there are still huge numbers of poor people in them. As I said, 57 million people—a lot by any standard—are in absolute poverty. We will not achieve the millennium development goals worldwide if we do not deal with the situation in Latin America.

Mr. Oscar Schiappa-Pietra is executive director of Peru's agency for international development aid co-operation. I had the privilege of meeting Mr. Schiappa-Pietra in Lima when I led an Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation in February. He wrote something very relevant about middle-income countries in a foreword to DFID's publication "Alliances Against Poverty: DFID's Experience in Peru 2000–2005". Of the middle-income country classification he says:

> "This is a label that greatly over-simplifies the complex socio-economic and political realities of countries like Peru . . . middle-income countries are often getting the worst out of globalization, because they are being left aside from much needed ODA"— official development assistance—

> "resources while still unable to compete in either the knowledge or the low-wage economy . . . the shift in classification from poor country to middle-income country misses an understanding of the transitional stage of internal adjustments such as those aimed at generating a more equitable allocation of resources and wealth."

DFID has particular knowledge and expertise to be able to address that problem. With such a vital role to play, DFID has to be active in Latin America.

The second reason why we should be interested in Latin America is that we can make a difference in helping that region to make progress. When I return from visits to Latin America, I am always optimistic about the region. Indeed, I am much more optimistic than I am when I return from some of the visits to Africa, where the situation in some countries is quite difficult. We are right to be involved in Africa, but one sometimes returns quite pessimistic about the prospects there.

In Latin America, the institutions are often better and stronger. Yes, there is corruption, but it is not as bad as in Africa. There are not wars and conflict on the same scale as in Africa. There is armed conflict in Colombia, but we are not talking about Darfurs, DRCs and so on in Latin America. Nor is there the scourge of international terrorism in Latin America. Above all, what makes me optimistic about the region is the great advances that there have been in achieving democracy. We are seeing many elections this year in Latin America, and in country after country we are seeing orderly, free and fair elections. That is not the case in every country, but it is in most of them. Recently in Bolivia, there was a very orderly and fair election; no one is challenging the result. The first round of elections in Peru was very close. People had to wait a week or two for the result, but the situation is being managed. That is very encouraging when one considers that it was not that long ago that many of those countries were being ruled by the military.

The third reason for regarding Latin America as important is that it has huge growth potential. Indeed, many of the countries have been experiencing substantial growth in recent years as a result of high commodity prices, although sadly that is not being translated sufficiently into poverty reduction. We as a country should not miss the opportunity to be involved there through trade and inward investment for mutual benefit, especially as the region contains countries with worldwide political influence. We ignore those countries at our peril. The most obvious example is Brazil, but there is also Mexico. Chile is important, too: it is a remarkable success story of economic progress and stability. If we do not take the opportunities in south America, China will. In fact, China is already moving in there in quite a big way. It is therefore important that we are in the region.

[Mr. Bob Blizzard]

The fourth reason is that many of the countries in south America want a strong relationship with the European Union to balance their political and trade relations with the USA. Given our Government's attitude towards trying to end EU protectionism, common agricultural policy reform and the type of deal that we are trying to secure from the Doha World Trade Organisation round, we are probably Latin America's best EU partner, if only more people would realise that. Many people and politicians in Latin America do not realise it.

I was fortunate enough to attend a conference of parliamentarians from all over Latin America last November in Buenos Aires, and I told the conference of our Government's efforts during the presidency of the European Union to tackle the immorality of the fact that in Europe we spend $2 a day per cow when 130-odd million people in Latin America live on less than $2 a day. After I had spoken, an Argentine politician passed me a note. She said:

"Your words are very good news for us. The media in Argentina haven't given information about this position. (We didn't know the English proposal about subsidies.) Thanks for this. Good information is one of the biggest needs we have. Sorry for my English."

I have to say that that lady's English was a lot better than my Spanish. I found those words quite encouraging, coming from an Argentine parliamentarian.

That leads me to a further point: how we as a country are all too often seen by the people and the politicians in Latin America. We are sometimes, sadly, seen only as America's partner in Iraq. As we know, people in south America do not particularly like President Bush and did not agree with the invasion. We therefore have a job to do to enable people in Latin America to see us as we really are, leading the world, as we did through the G8, on debt relief, increased aid, getting a fair trade agreement at the WTO, tackling the millennium development goals and devising the international finance facility. That is the position that we need to establish clearly in people's minds in Latin America, but we can do so only by being involved. Our one advantage is that, despite everything else, we are still respected for the quality of what we do, as we are throughout the world.

The fifth reason we should take Latin America very seriously concerns drugs. I shall say more about this later, but we should remember that the world's three biggest coca producers are all in south America: Columbia, Peru and Bolivia.

I now turn to DFID's regional assistance programme. There has been a major change in the way DFID operates in Latin America. It has moved away from bilateral country-focused assistance programmes to more strategic involvement, working with the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank. That change, along with the closure of offices in Peru and Honduras and the closure of our embassy in Paraguay, has led to a charge that the Government are withdrawing from Latin America.

It is sad and disappointing when programmes close. I read what was achieved in Peru concerning citizenship and governance in "Alliances Against Poverty", and it is sad to see that coming to an end. When I was fortunate enough to lead an IPU delegation to Brazil in 2003, we saw first-hand some of the work going on through DFID in the north-east of that country to help poor and excluded people to gain confidence to pursue their rights in a responsible way. When we made a more recent visit to Peru in February, the Prime Minister of Peru, Mr. Pedro Pablo Kuczynski, told us straight, "It is not aid we need. We do not need aid; we have got a lot of money now from the commodities that we are selling. What we need is knowledge, expertise and technical support."

The more I have examined DFID's new strategy and the more I have learned about Latin America, the more I think that the new approach could be even more effective, if it works. DFID's knowledge and expertise in exerting influence on the way in which the World Bank and the IDB work in Latin America has great potential to focus efforts more successfully on poverty reduction, which is a job that needs doing. That process relies on DFID's great strength in the world; wherever I have been, I see DFID punching above its weight, using its high-quality reputation. I met staff who were working out of the Andean office in La Paz, and I pay tribute to the work that they are doing.

There are two huge challenges involved in the new strategy. The first is the challenge of being able to influence international financial institutions—the IFIs—such as the World Bank and the IDB. It will be a challenge to get them to use their money in a sufficiently transparent way, to use it more thoughtfully and to aim it more effectively at poverty reduction. This is a matter of widespread concern. The Minister and other hon. Members will know of the international parliamentarians' petition for democratic oversight of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. Across the world, 55 Parliaments have been involved with the petition; I do not have the latest figures, but when I last looked, there were well over 1,000 signatures. I am delighted that 365 of those came from Parliaments in this country. That is a major challenge, but it needs to be taken on.

The second challenge is to overcome the growing disaffection and mistrust of the IFIs that so many people and politicians in Latin America share. Politicians, civil society groups, trade unionists in Latin America and international non-governmental organisations have documented many examples of misconceived schemes, often agreed between the IFIs and discredited former leaders with little or no transparency or accountability and no involvement of parliamentarians or community representatives, or with loan or trade conditions that destroyed local livelihoods and, in some cases, wrought macro-economic damage. As a result, the Washington consensus reforms of the 1990s are widely seen as a failure in Latin America because of their lack of impact in reducing poverty.

In that part of the world, there is now a deep suspicion of globalisation, privatisation and labour market reform, but from a wider historical perspective, one can see that the region needs to find acceptable ways of becoming less protectionist and expanding trade because of some of its past failings. Politicians from all over the region now regularly condemn neo-liberalism, which is chiming with electorates. We have seen that in the results of various elections, most recently in Bolivia and currently in Peru, where such messages are well received by people and reflected in the way in which they vote. I have to say, however, that some commentators have been very simplistic in painting all the leaders on the left as being the same and representing some sweeping direction. There is a world of difference between Chile, Bolivia, Brazil and Venezuela.

It is worth remembering what Ricardo Lagos, a centre-left moderate by Latin American standards who was until recently the President of Chile, said when he came here for the conference on progressive governance in 2003, in a speech entitled "A View from the South":

"We've completed all the tasks assigned to us by the so-called 'Washington Consensus' . . . Nevertheless, the fact that Chile has completed these tasks does not necessarily mean that the Washington consensus is correct . . . In Chile, we were able to stick to the Washington consensus because in addition to it we did other things, and this is what really made the difference . . . if you are going to have growth, you need public policies that ensure that growth will be enjoyed by the many. If not, then you are on the wrong track. In the long-term, if you are not creating a cohesive society you will be defeated. This is what I think has happened in most American countries."

Those are very wise words.

However, the UK has the credentials to help to overcome the deep suspicion of IFI policies that exists throughout Latin America, which clearly influences the attitudes of some Governments. My first reason for saying that is our policy on conditionality—particularly trade conditionality. That was best expressed by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in his "Wall of Shame" speech of last October. He said:

"We have seen all too often before how the World Bank/IMF 'one size fits all' shock therapy prescription has produced macroeconomic instability, rising unemployment and profound inequality. Societies and economies have been left dislocated . . . we must not force liberalisation on developing countries . . . we must leave it for them to decide the 'what, when and how' of their market openings."

Those words will be very well received in many Latin American countries. My second reason is our policy on aid conditionality, clearly set out in DFID's policy paper of March 2005, which places an emphasis on genuine, bottom-up poverty reduction strategy papers, not the imposition of conditions.

Another thing that will encourage people is our stated policy of trying to reform the World Bank and the IMF. DFID produced its first report in 2004 on its dealings with the World Bank, and committed itself to using a seat on the board to gain reform. The Treasury has taken a similar stance regarding the IMF. I have mentioned our stance within the EU of wanting better access to markets for poorer countries, including those in Latin America, which I also believe would be well received.

Above all, however, I emphasise the stand we have taken in the world in taking the heavily indebted poor countries initiative forward, from which Bolivia, Nicaragua and Honduras have benefited, our historic stand in the G8, which resulted in the Gleneagles agreement, and the efforts of the Chancellor in the devising and promotion of the international finance facility to help to achieve millennium goals. The really good news is that Brazil signed up to that, in relation to HIV/AIDS, during President Lula's recent state visit.

Having said how our involvement in Latin America could help to overcome some of those suspicions, I would like to ask my hon. Friend the Minister some questions about where we have got to in relation to some of the issues I raised. What progress have we made with the World Bank on decentralisation of programmes and on increasing stakeholder participation in the design of the poverty reduction strategy papers? Have we got anywhere in achieving parliamentary oversight and modification of those programmes? Have we managed to gain any ground in achieving stronger representation on the World Bank board for the poor recipient countries? People have asked for a parliamentary role in the selection of its executive director and other equivalents throughout the world. Have we got anywhere with that? There have been calls for external auditing of World Bank operations and recorded votes at board meetings. Have we got anywhere on any or all of that?

How do we influence the IDB when we do not have the same representation on the board as we do on the World Bank? It seems that the IDB, on which Latin American countries have strong representation, has the right goals; but, again, they are not being sufficiently translated into poverty reduction.

What is the overall process for monitoring the strategy of the regional assistance programme? Is DFID planning to publish annual reports? How do we know if the strategy is succeeding? How does the European Union programme for Latin America fit into that? The EU spends about $375 million a year, so how does it fit in, and how are we trying to invest that EU spend?

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to do all that he can in the Department to encourage regional integration in Latin America, particularly in terms of transport and energy infrastructure. It is really lacking. Out there, one notices the absence of such transnational infrastructure. There is much suspicion between countries about going down that route. There is outright opposition in some quarters, which see it as some kind of neo-liberal plot.

I hope that there is a lesson to be learned from the European Union. EU integration has actually benefited the poorer countries most. Countries such as Portugal and Spain used to be poorer than Argentina and Brazil. Now they have come up in the world, and I suspect that the EU has played a big part. It is a strong argument to put to people in Latin America, and I hope that DFID can do so.

There are some very good UK non-governmental organisations working in the region. I recently visited a project run by the Action for Brazil's Children Trust in Recife in north-east Brazil. I saw an excellent, high quality and sustainable scheme, which works with a local partner. The ABC Trust runs five schemes and supports 13 others in Brazil. In Peru, we learned about the work of the Vine Trust, a Scottish based charity that has provided several millions of pounds in cash and volunteer medics and doctors who have gone out there. The trust has a medical boat called the Amazon Hope, based at Iquitos in Peru. It travels throughout the Amazon, bringing valuable medical care to thousands of people who would otherwise have nothing. When we were in Peru in February, a second boat, which had had a £1 million refit, was on its way from this country to join it.

Such initiatives are wonderful, and I wonder what DFID is doing to support that sort of work. It makes a real difference and it helps to build the good relations that we need. The regional assistance programme says that DFID will provide increased funding for international NGOs. Will my hon. Friend the Minister provide any details about how we support such organisations?

The issues surrounding drugs in Latin America, as in other parts of the world, can undermine all that DFID tries to do. For example, coca and the cocaine system in Latin America impact not only on the economies of those countries, but on their environments and social cohesion. They can bring death and violence throughout the world. The authorities in Peru told us clearly that coca production is on the increase again in Peru. President Morales, who was recently elected in Bolivia, says that he wants his coca growers—he was a coca grower leader—to be able to grow more coca not less. Policies such as crop eradication, which have been tried, are now politically unacceptable to most politicians in Latin America because of the economic hardship that they have brought to coca growers who then rise up and, as we have seen, can sometimes overthrow Governments.

Crop substitution has been tried and does not work either, because the economics of it are not right. Farmers can get more from growing coca than they can from other crops. Our best bet is intelligence-led intervention in drug trafficking. We as a Government have overseas drug liaison officers in several Latin American countries. They are under the direction of the Serious Organised Crime Agency. However, when we were in Peru in February, we were astounded to learn that the two drug liaison officers based in Lima were being redeployed in April to Colombia.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend confirm that in Bolivia, President Morales takes the position that coca is to be grown for traditional use, essentially as a palliative chewing agent, rather than for conversion into hard drugs that end up on the streets of north America or Europe?

Mr. Blizzard: Absolutely. President Morales believes that there are markets for the traditional uses of coca. When I stayed in La Paz, our ambassador gave me up a cup of coca tea. Apparently, it is very useful for adjusting to the altitude. Coca has medicinal purposes, and it has traditionally been chewed. At the inauguration of President Morales, I saw many of his deputies sitting in rows, and in front of them were piles of coca leaves, which they were chewing. It is a traditional part of the culture, and the President has initiated a study to find out where those new markets could be. The fear is that those markets do not have enough capacity to consume all the coca grown, and though not intended for the illegal markets, it may end up there. We will need to be vigilant to ensure that it does not.

Above all, now is the time for more work by drug liaison officers. SOCA told me that it redeployed the two officers from Peru to Colombia because Peruvian cocaine does not come to this country, and most of the cocaine that does comes from Colombia. That is different from what we were told in Peru, but I do not have the factual evidence to challenge SOCA. However, it strikes me that rather than deploying from one country to another, we need increased presence in all those countries. There is so much coca going from Bolivia, Peru and Colombia through Brazil and other countries and into Europe. What happens to it then, I do not know.

The drug issue is important not only for us, but for the well-being of the countries that we are trying to help. I hope that DFID will have some conversations with SOCA to find out how its drugs work can complement the Department's strategy.

Section D18 of the regional assistance programme states that DFID

"will co-operate with the British Council in its work on governance issues in Latin America".

The British Council does tremendous work throughout the world, and particularly in Latin America. In the past five years, it has sent 1,300 Chevening scholars to the UK. That has had all kinds of advantages for those scholars, their countries and our country, as experts and teachers are sent on exchanges in both directions.

I hear that the British Council is reviewing all aspects of its work in Latin America, and one of the likely outcomes is the closure of our presence in Peru. That would send the wrong message; if we were seen to be withdrawing, that would make the challenges that I have outlined even more difficult. I support the new strategy, but its total effect on Peru is that we have closed the DFID office, withdrawn drugs liaison officers and may withdraw the British Council. Peru is the third largest country in south America.

DFID's document on regional assistance plans contains a good appraisal of the risks of the new strategy, one of which is "a risk that we may lose credibility due to our more limited country presence."

We risk losing credibility in Peru, a country that receives more tourists and travellers from this country than from any other in the world other than the United States. There is great potential in Peru, and I hope that we shall consider how the issues add up there.

I conclude with an even more important point. The regional assistance plans are reviewed this year, and we must make sure that what has happened in Peru does not become the shape of things to come across Latin America. I hope that the Minister can reassure me on that. I have demonstrated that I want the new strategy to succeed. Some have said that it is a kind of fig leaf for withdrawal from the region. I do not believe that; I believe that the strategy is good and right, and I want it to succeed.

However, if it is to do so, there must be no more decline or withdrawal. We know that extra resources had to be diverted to Iraq for reconstruction. Many of us did not support going into Iraq, but we are there and have to reconstruct, so we understand why those resources were necessary. Hopefully, things will get a bit better in Iraq and we may be able to withdraw; will there then be scope for improving resources in Latin America or putting back in place some of those that we used to have there? We need to assure everybody that our involvement in Latin America is substantial, long-term and succeeding. If we can do that, we will be on the right track.

During his state visit to this country just the other week, President Lula said:

"This state visit opens a new chapter in relations between our Governments and societies. We now have the chance to join forces in order to face the various challenges presented by the contemporary world."

We should make that true for Brazil, and for Latin America as a whole.

10.3 am

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard). He is chair of the all-party Latin America group; I am one of its vice-chairs and a member of a number of other groups on Latin American countries.

In those groups, we have had many learned discussions about the need for debates on Latin America, and everybody at the meetings says that it is a terribly good idea, but unfortunately they have not been able to carry it into practice by actually turning up for this debate. That is a matter of deep regret, but I am sure that they are all busy dealing with park benches in the local election campaign.

It is excellent that we are having this debate, which we have to put in the context of the incredible poverty that still exists in Latin America. The business pages often learnedly refer to Latin America as being made up of middle-income countries. Indeed, when arriving at any Latin American capital city, one finds a very European feel about their centres and business districts. The languages spoken are European, the businesses are often owned by European or north American companies, and there are high standards of living. However, we do not have to travel far outside those capital cities to see the poverty, the discrimination behind it and the sense of social dislocation that it brings.

My hon. Friend referred to the election of Evo Morales as President of Bolivia, which is significant because he is one of the first leaders to be elected in the region who is not of European descent and whose first language is not European. He represents an interesting and powerful social phenomenon throughout Latin America.

There is terrible poverty throughout the region: 26 per cent. of the 524 million population of Latin America and the Caribbean live on less than $2 a day; in other words, 132 million people there live in desperate poverty. Haiti, and now Nicaragua, are the poorest countries in the region. Some 80 per cent. of Nicaragua's population of 5 million live on less than $2 a day, so there is massive poverty. Even in Brazil, which has one of the highest per capita incomes in the region, 24 per cent. of the population live on less than $2 a day.

Those levels of poverty are a disgrace in every sense and completely unnecessary. They lead to violence, crime, drug dealing and social dislocation and we have to address those issues. Perhaps, as the DFID programme suggests, we should tackle Latin American poverty differently from African or Asian poverty, but nevertheless it has to be addressed.

I have had the good fortune to have visited many countries in Latin America. I have seen that poverty for myself. I have never forgotten arriving in Bolivia in 1969, and finding people wearing bowler hats and chewing coca leaves. The experience was extraordinary—I thought it an extraordinary place—but I have also never forgotten the unbelievable poverty that existed then, and still exists, in the mountain villages and towns. One does not have to go far—to Potosi, for example, where the Spanish made billions from the silver, or to the tin mining areas where British companies made billions—to understand the passion of Bolivian people when they say, "We lost our silver to the Spanish and our tin to the British and others; we're not going to lose our gas and oil in the same way." We have to understand that important message.

I have not understood all the details of the statement issued by President Morales last night about taking over the gas and oil fields, but essentially he is ensuring that Bolivia gets at the very least a far higher proportion of the revenue from its gas and oil than hitherto. He is fulfilling an election pledge, which was to take the resources as a whole into public ownership. The statement was met immediately with large demonstrations on the streets of La Paz in support. We have to remember that the radical tradition in Latin America is a very strong one.

The issues also relate to land ownership and access to land. Early this year, I visited Guatemala. I was travelling by bus, and the main road to Guatemala City from the Mexican border was closed for about a week, with gaps on and off when it was opened, because of a peasant demonstration about land ownership which had occupied the main highway. The reaction of the travellers on the bus and at the bus station was interesting. They were all greatly inconvenienced, because they had to wait 24, 36 or 48 hours to travel, but they showed great sympathy for the peasants who had occupied the road to stop the traffic going through.

Guatemala has come through the most horrific civil war. In its aftermath, the levels of crime are unbelievably high, as many demobilised fighters from both sides have kept their weapons and turned to crime instead. That brings up questions about structures of government, human rights and all the accompanying issues in the region.

Some countries have changed dramatically and have overcome the worst vestiges of poverty in many ways. The most obvious example is Cuba, which from a position of enormous poverty in the 1950s and 1960s, has achieved possibly the region's highest standard of living, and certainly the highest standards of literacy, access to higher education and health care, to the extent that it is now a major resource of health care throughout the region. Indeed, many of the health improvements in Venezuela, Bolivia and Peru have come from having Cuban doctors in those countries.

I understand that the Government and many others are not totally at one with the Cuban political system, but they should understand the incredible achievements that have been made in Cuba and the esteem in which it is held by many of the region's poorest people. The improvements that are now taking place in Venezuela, and the support that exists for Hugo Chavez and his Bolivarian revolution should be put in the historical context. In a sense, it represents the unfinished business of the independence movement of the 1820s against the Spanish and Portuguese empires. Independence was gained, but it was largely grabbed by the landowning classes rather than the peasants. Chavez sees himself as carrying through the Bolivarian revolution. We must understand the historical context if we are to understand the present situation.

The political change to which my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney referred is not a unified continuum throughout the region, but a huge swathe of political change has happened throughout Latin America. There was a period of considerable radicalism in the 1960s and early 1970s, when several countries elected moderately radical Governments or very radical Governments committed to land reform and change. There was then the nightmare period when the military took over in a large number of countries, famously in Chile and Argentina, but they were certainly very powerful in many other countries too. The imposition of a crude form of market economics by the United States throughout the region led to the debt revolt of the 1980s and to arguments about debt forgiveness and debt write-off well in advance of what happened anywhere else. Those issues must be borne in mind.

The radical movements that are now happening—the election of Chavez in Venezuela and Morales in Bolivia, the current Peruvian elections and the welcome election of Michelle Bachelet as President of Chile—show that change is possible. Having visited Chile many times, I know that the idea of a single mother being elected President of Chile would have been unbelievable until recently. I congratulate her and what we hope will be her successful programme for poverty eradication and the improvement of social care and social issues there.

How we treat Latin America is important. Before I make a couple of comments about DFID's strategy and programme, I should say that we must remember that the continent came out of, and led the way against, European imperialism in the 19th century. The Monroe doctrine ensured that the United States guaranteed enormous power for itself throughout the region. The US has attempted to impose various trade deals throughout Latin America, which famously exploded at the Buenos Aires trade conference last year.

Venezuela, Bolivia and Cuba are pushing for a Latin American internal trade deal that has poverty reduction and education improvement targets within it , which is unusual for any kind of trade-oriented pact. The wish of the United States for a very different kind of trade pact is currently supported mainly by Colombia and by President Fox of Mexico, but I suspect that should Mr. López Obrador succeed in winning the Mexican elections later this year—I hope he does—there will be a change of approach there.

It is important to put things in that context. The influence in the region now is not the United States or Europe; the huge investment that is currently going into Latin America is Chinese. I was at a lecture last week at Canning house that detailed the levels of investment that the Chinese are putting in to each country, most of which is in the form of soft loans tied to the sale of natural resources and to the import of Chinese goods into the continent, including the massive infrastructure projects—new ports, railways and roads—to which my hon. Friend referred. That is currently the biggest influence in Latin America.

The Chinese strategy appears radically different from the US strategies of the past, which have always been to encourage the involvement of private sector companies—mainly American—and an obsessive meddling in local politics; the US cannot help itself when it comes to meddling in local politics. The Chinese approach is very different: it is blunt, crude, straightforward economic dealing. The Chinese keep well out of any local political movements or developments. That will be the feature of Latin America in the next few years.

I read the interesting DFID strategy document last night and re-examined it this morning. The issues that it highlights concerning AIDS, human rights, poverty reduction and education are good. The first issue to examine is that of human rights and governance. The problems encountered in the region often involve human rights abuses, illegal imprisonment and the wholesale murder of people on the streets. I mentioned Chile, where under Pinochet at least 7,000 people perished. Proportionally speaking, a similar number perished in Argentina, although the actual number was much greater, and similar things occurred in many other countries in the region. I also mentioned what happened in Guatemala during its civil war and what continues to happen: illegal killings, gang warfare and the like.

Mexico is certainly not the region's poorest county, but its level of human rights abuses and discrimination against the non-Spanish-speaking people, the deaths of women in Ciudad Juárez on the border, and the drug rackets and all the other things that feed that are extremely serious. Whatever efforts we can make in respect of supporting human rights organisations and a system of legal processes that is independent of the political process are important and welcome. I certainly welcome that section of DFID's strategy document for the region.

We must examine Britain's relations with the region, first in terms of its politics and what we are doing. I welcome DFID's strategy document in that sense, but I question how it sits with our closing embassies and British Council and DFID offices in the region. Do we expect to have any influence from this country or from the European Union? The presence of a British embassy in a country indicates that we are serious about relations with it. To close an embassy and tell people that the nearest one is in the neighbouring country or in the next but one, and is several hundred or several thousand miles away—making such a journey is extremely difficult for most people—does not create a good image. I hope that the Minister will be able to offer some good news on that front.

The British aid programme is quite small in the context of the region as a whole. The bilateral aid system, with European and UN money going in, is important, but we must remember that the levels of poverty and discrimination, and the lack of education are a product of the historic injustices in the region, and the thirst for change is strong. I cited Cuba earlier, and we should note that the support that Chavez has in Venezuela is partly because he is seen as somebody who is outside the traditional political system in the country—and he certainly is that—and partly because his Government are seen to be trying to do something in terms of delivering health care, education and housing for the poorest people in the country. Such is the thirst for change in the region. Conquering poverty in the region comes, yes, from assistance and from fair trade arrangements, but it also comes from the significant political change that is happening throughout the region.

Latin America has an incredible past in terms of its civilisations and the history that comes from them. It is a past that is understood in a popular sense. Museums in the United States talk about conquering the west, and European expansion and settlement. Museums in Mexico or any other Latin American country talk about the glory that was destroyed by the Spanish invasion and the attempt to write it out of history. The image of how Latin American civilisations were damaged by Europe is still very powerful, and it has become a powerful political force in the countries that I have mentioned.

This debate is about British strategy in respect of Latin America. We must do all we can to support good governance, decent human rights organisations, campaigns to improve the position and rights of women, and above all the campaign for the rights of indigenous people in multilingual societies throughout Latin America. We must understand all those matters. The dominant themes of the region are its huge natural resources, its amazingly efficient farming in very difficult circumstances and its astonishing cultural diversity.

Our country has made a great deal of money over the centuries from trade with Latin America. It is now up to us to trade honourably with Latin America and to support it in getting decent and fair trade arrangements with the rest of the world.

10.22 am

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): I am grateful for this opportunity to contribute to the debate on behalf of the Liberal Democrats. I also join others in thanking the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) for securing it.

In the United Kingdom, poverty reduction and development issues tend to focus on Africa and parts of Asia, and sadly Latin America can get left out of the picture, but as we have been reminded today, it is home to many of the poorest people on the planet.

The Department for International Development stated in March this year, in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz):

"According to 2004 national poverty line data collected by the United Nations, 42.9 per cent."— approaching half—

"of the population of Latin America live in poverty and 18.6 per cent. live in extreme poverty. The levels of extreme poverty are higher among indigenous and afro-descendant people."—[Official Report, 15 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 2247W.]

I therefore share the concern of others that DFID's strategy in respect of deciding where to use its resources understates the needs and importance of Latin America, and I ask it to review that strategy.

I am talking not about significant increases in monetary aid but essentially about the opportunity to share UK experience and knowledge, and especially the lessons that have been learned from the ways in which the EU accession countries have managed to develop, and from development and poverty reduction problems in Africa. The transfer of that experience, knowledge and expertise is key. Although I, along with others, understand and appreciate that a multilateral strategy is often ideal, if what we need to achieve cannot be accomplished through the mechanisms of the World Bank and the International Development Association it would be sad to have abandoned more direct bilateral approaches and the relationships that the UK has built up with the countries that are now attempting to deal with the poverty in their midst.

There seem to be two general factors that discourage DFID from being more engaged in Latin America. One of them may be a matter of perception, but it is a high-risk geopolitical strategy in any case. Under the Monroe doctrine, the United States places Latin America within its sphere of influence and encourages European countries to play a lesser role. That may not particularly motivate the UK, but its lack of activity—the withdrawal of offices, the turn to an overwhelmingly multilateral approach—could easily be interpreted as acquiescence to the idea that Latin America is outside our sphere of influence, and that we have ceded to the US. May I suggest that, particularly in these times, that is a pretty dangerous approach?

Latin America is a rising continent in its own right. Brazil has already been identified by Goldman Sachs and other investment banks as one of four countries that are particularly important for the future world economy. Whether or not one agrees with Chavez, Venezuela has oil resources that provide it with international clout. The Mercosur trading bloc covers a population of 250 million people and produces more than $1 trillion a year in goods and services. These are large, major players who do not wish to be seen as an adjunct to north America and the United States.

It is evident from any reading of statements and speeches across the continent that there is widespread suspicion of the USA and its intentions. President Bush's recent attempt to take forward a free trade area of the Americas looks like an uphill struggle, in part because the US is seen as having been responsible for past neo-liberal reforms that were unsuccessful, and as having an agenda that is primarily focused on the interests of the United States rather than poverty reduction in Latin America. Most Latin American Governments, by contrast, claim that they are seeking development strategies that combine the benefits of economic markets and social welfare. As such, they are following a model that is in many ways much closer to the European model—to the UK model, even—than to that of the USA. That argues for a much more direct kind of engagement and a recognition that there can be a very fruitful exchange between the European continent and Latin America, because, out of history, Latin America seems to be developing a similar approach to Europe's to many fundamental problems.

Numerous articles have been written in recent weeks about Latin America's swerve to the left. Although rifts and friction exist between many Latin American countries over specific issues, and the colour and texture of Governments are extremely varied, there is now a broad consensus that the reforms of the 1990s—captured by the term "neo-liberalism"—failed to deliver the promised wealth, and at best left the continent stagnant. Many people accept that reform was necessary, and that opening up to trade was necessary—indeed, urgently so—but the 1990s experience was so undermined by corruption, cronyism and a lack of willingness to tackle the problem of the vast numbers of people at the bottom of the social heap in dire poverty, that new answers are now being sought. Again, I believe that the UK should be playing a bigger role in that.

The second reason for DFID's limited engagement results from the fact that most Latin American countries have a middle-income standing in development terms, but stark inequalities mean that many of the poorest people are effectively glossed over by that description. These are countries where great wealth and great poverty exist side by side. The challenge for most of Latin America is to find strategies for development that reach down to the destitute poor. Even in Brazil—one of the wealthiest countries in the region—the rural landless and the urban roofless are scarcely being touched by development programmes.

Latin American countries—I accept that I am generalising—are trying to combine social welfare to tackle poverty with fiscal responsibility, typically in the form of tighter budgets, competitive currencies and trade surpluses. However, these countries remain heavily dependent on commodities and are short on the infrastructure and private investment that could underpin economic diversification. Surely, this is an area in which the UK could be more of a facilitator. The experiences of eastern Europe and India, in which the UK has been widely engaged, offer role models in respect of commercial legal frameworks and governance, which are key to encouraging private investment. I understand that DFID has had some engagement with initiatives such as microcredit and community banking schemes, but I am sure that it could work more effectively with international financial institutions—IFIs—such as the Inter-American Development Bank to facilitate a much wider expansion of such projects.

The environment and climate change are bound up with this as well. In January 2006, the Brazilian Government released figures showing that deforestation of the Amazon rain forest was almost the worst on record, with more than 10,000 square miles having been cleared by ranchers, loggers and farmers. The problem affects all of us, but it cannot be tackled without strategies for the sustainable management of rain forests and sustainable development that will provide a decent living for the local population.

I have seen good projects in the United States, particularly in the ancient forests of the Pacific north-west. The Pacific branch of ShoreBank and groups such as Ecotrust have worked with local people to develop effective sustainable alternatives. Surely DFID could do more to promote such schemes for the Amazon, including working with the European Union to provide markets for sustainable forest products.

My view on drugs is somewhat different from that of the hon. Member for Waveney. If farmers are to move away from coca as an export crop for the drugs trade, there must be a long-term sustainable alternative. Our various programmes have never seriously taken on that challenge and used existing role models and examples to provide a long-term opportunity for people, whether in Latin America or places such as Afghanistan.

At present, Latin America is enjoying a benign economic period. As others have said, demand for commodities, whether Brazil's iron ore, Peru's copper or Argentina's beef, has been fuelled by growth in India and China. The US continues to fuel Latin America's economy by providing employment for significant numbers of migrant workers, both legal and illegal. Remittances to Latin America increased last year by 17 per cent., to $54 billion. Foreign banks are taking a positive and benign attitude towards Latin America, largely because they are hunting for yield. They are courting major country players and have been willing to convert dollar denominated debt into local currency denominated debt at reasonable prices.

My fear is that the optimism fuelled by these benign conditions is being squandered. For example, Brazil used the good times to reduce its long-term external debt from 40 per cent. of gross domestic product in 2002 to an expected 13.5 per cent. in 2006, but only a tiny fraction of real public spending increases—9 per cent. last year—was invested back in infrastructure such as roads, bridges and railways, which are the basis of future diversification.

Even a minor global economic downturn would devastate the economies of Latin America, and if economic diversification and strategies to tackle poverty and inequality cannot be put in place while economic times are good, the chances of doing so will be nil when less good times arrive.

Following up on the theme of urgency, the countries of Latin America need success in the Doha trade round. Brazil, like Russia, India and China, is probably sufficiently powerful and successful to cut its own deal with the major trading blocs, regardless of whether Doha is a success, but the remaining countries of Latin America fall into that dangerous middle ground: not poor enough to qualify for the open access permitted to the least developed, but not strong enough to be able to carve out a way alone. The failure to meet the 30 April deadline on the broad parameters for tariff and subsidy reductions in the Doha round raises a fear that the opportunity will be lost. Again, if a development trade round cannot be achieved when the global economic environment is generally positive, as it is today, there can be little hope of achieving it at all.

In January, in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland), DFID provided a detailed breakdown of bilateral funding to south and central America. Of course there are exceptions, but it is clear from those numbers that overall funding has been extremely volatile since 1997. It is hard not to conclude that programmes are constantly stopping and starting—the direction keeps changing—but we know that consistency and predictability matter in aid and development.

Let me conclude with a plea to DFID. The countries of Latin America are in a period when, economically, much is going their way. Perhaps that will last for some time, but the reality is that the slightest economic downturn will generally cause problems and make life more difficult. The inequalities of society in most of those countries mean that people live in dire, impoverished conditions. It will be interesting to see how DFID intends to seize the moment, while the opportunity is good, permanently and sustainably to support improvements. I ask that Latin America not slip from the Department's priorities.

10.35 am

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) on securing this important and timely debate and by putting on the record my view that his chairmanship of the all-party group on Latin America has resulted in the group's renaissance and has moved Latin America up the agenda in both the Department for International Development and the Foreign Office. I welcome that. He will know that I am particularly interested in Latin America, and I was pleased that this Minister and the relevant Minister in the Foreign Office came to a meeting in this House to discuss with interested Members the area's importance and the strategies that will be put in place in the forthcoming period.

The hon. Gentleman did a well-informed and eloquent samba, if I can use that word, through Latin American issues. He eloquently described the importance of United Kingdom-Latin America links, the failure of many Latin American countries to meet some of the millennium development goals, particularly in respect of indigenous populations, which is a theme that I shall return to later, and the huge growth potential of Latin America, particularly Brazil, as a trading partner of Britain and the European Union. He also discussed how Brazil can become an influential regional player. I know that the Government support Brazil's position as a full-time member of the United Nations Security Council.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned aid conditionality. I have never had an answer from the Minister or anybody else about the difference between aid conditionality and aid criteria. Perhaps the Minister would take this opportunity to answer that point.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) has a particular interest in Latin America, and that came over in his speech. He is well informed about the area and, obviously, has visited it over an extensive period. I do not agree with all his analyses, particularly of what is happening in Cuba and in Venezuela. He rightly highlighted the many human rights infringements that have taken place and continue to take place in Latin America, but I was slightly surprised that he praised the Cuban regime which, as he well knows, has an appalling human rights record.

The hon. Gentleman was absolutely right to highlight the high levels of crime that exist across Latin America and the lack of governmental infrastructure at national and local levels in many of those countries. DFID certainly could play a significant role in building civil society and capacity.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) gave an informed contribution, although her view of economic policies in Latin America in the 1990s was rather simplistic. There has been economic growth—indeed, Latin American growth was highest in 2004, at 5.5 per cent. It is not a story of everything going backwards. People have been pulled out of poverty, although the rate of population increase has been greater than the rate at which economic liberalisation has allowed people to come out of poverty, and the definite lack of wealth cascading down to the indigenous and black populations has resulted in the rise of Chavez, Morales and potentially others, which desperately needs to be addressed. Latin America cannot turn its back on the international trading community; there will be significant problems if it chooses to do so.

The hon. Lady was absolutely right to mention environmental degradation, particularly deforestation in Brazil but not only in Brazil, and the importance of and necessity for sustainable development and management of agriculture.

I do not wish to repeat statistics that other hon. Members have given but just say that it is absolutely clear that a significant proportion of the population in Latin America, central America and the Caribbean live in abject poverty. It is unacceptable that 132 million out of a total population of 520 million people live on less than $2 per day, and we need to do more about it. I will come to what I think needs to be done a little later.

It is the inequality that is so distressing in Latin America. The hon. Member for Islington, North was absolutely right: one can fly into almost any Latin American capital and see glossy tower blocks and housing, and representatives of the international banking community and international organisations. However, in not only rural areas, but the outskirts of those cities, one can see terrible slums—or ranchos, as they are called in many countries in South America—terrible poverty and the crime that inevitably comes out of it. That crime needs to be addressed.

However, there is some good news, as the hon. Member for Waveney highlighted. There is growing solidity of the democratic process in south America, although there are some problems. I certainly would not argue that Chavez was a total democrat, but I do not want to get sidetracked by that issue. There is still far too much corruption and there is weak governmental accountability; that needs to be addressed with the assistance of donor countries, by DFID and the international community, and through multilateral institutions.

We Conservative Members welcome the funding that DFID commits to Latin America. There is the £300 million committed through multilateral contributions to the Inter-American Development Bank, the European Union, the UN, the World Bank and non-governmental organisations; the £41 million committed through the Latin American bilateral programme; and the £23 million committed through other bilateral funds, such as the civil society challenge fund and the global conflict prevention pool. However, when that is compared with DFID's contributions to Africa and Iraq, we see that Latin America is a very small beneficiary of aid money. Just 1 per cent. of direct budgetary support, and 3 per cent. of bilateral aid, goes to Latin America.

I would argue that Latin America has been overlooked, partially because it is largely made up of what are viewed as middle-income countries, as other hon. Members have said, and partially because of the success of lobbying groups for Africa—that is, of the Commission for Africa and of the G8 at Gleneagles. Also, as the hon. Member for Islington, North, said, the UK's relationship with Latin and central America has been damaged by the closure of embassies, DFID offices and trade offices. We have just closed two trade offices in Brazil. I am sure that the Minister or someone at the Department of Trade and Industry has a good explanation for that, but it seems extraordinary, given how powerful a trading partner Brazil will be in future, and particularly given China's significant and growing influence in Latin America.

I have two or three specific issues to raise. The first is debt. Obviously, we Conservative Members welcome the heavily indebted poor countries initiative and its success in Bolivia, Guyana, Honduras and Nicaragua, but many other countries in Latin America have significant burdens of heavy debt; Peru, Ecuador, Argentina and Brazil are four examples of countries classified as severely indebted by the World Bank.

Heavy debt keeps poor people poor and, in the worst cases, pushes millions of people into poverty. Debt inhibits growth and wealth redistribution by reducing the amount of money available to Governments to invest in social services and welfare. Brazil is perhaps the best example: 40 million people there live on less than $2 a day. Brazil spends three times as much servicing debt as it does on public health care. That is not sustainable, nor should it be internationally acceptable. There are many other such examples. I would welcome comment from the Minister on what the international community will do to address debt.

We could talk for some time about the political situation in Venezuela, and about that country's influence in the surrounding regions—not just in Latin America, but as a result of its selling cheap oil to the Caribbean, and its potential for influence at the UN and elsewhere. My question to the Minister on that topic is: where has the strategy for security sector reform—particularly of the police and judicial systems—mentioned in DFID's Latin America strategy paper got to in combating the problems caused by drugs and drug barons in Latin America, and in curbing armed groups? The hon. Member for Waveney was right to say that the same degree of conflict resolution required elsewhere is not necessary in Latin America, but there are still armed groups—particularly in Colombia and parts of Mexico—whose influence, both political and military, needs to be reduced; we must make sure that their power is channelled through, and focused on, the ballot box.

My second question to the Minister is about poverty reduction strategy papers. Clearly, as DFID is taking a regionalised, rather than country-specific, view it will be much more difficult for countries to participate, particularly those that are in the process of drawing up their poverty reduction strategy papers. How does the regionalisation strategy and policy fit with working with Governments to make sure that their poverty reduction strategy papers are appropriate to their country, and not to regions? There are great differences between countries in Latin and central America. We have to make sure that poverty reduction strategy papers are relevant, that Governments buy into them, and that they are not donor-driven, as has happened elsewhere, as the Minister will be aware.

Like the hon. Member for Richmond Park, I did not agree with the hon. Member for Waveney on his rather defeatist attitude to the drug problem. There is an argument for allowing the Bolivians and others to produce coca for their own traditional purposes. I was in Yemen recently, where people chew khat in much the same way that people chew coca in Bolivia. Longer-term, we have to find a strategy—an alternative crop or alternative livelihoods—to ensure that the volume of production is not sufficient to allow an enormous amount for export, as that creates problems in north America and Europe.

Mr. Blizzard: Many people in Latin America would respond to the hon. Gentleman's point—and this was part of President Morales's response on the subject—by saying: "Well, what about demand?" As long as there is demand, growers will try to grow coca; that is their point.

Mark Simmonds: I accept that. The traditional drug problem solution has been to try to cut off supply, and that has failed singularly over the past 20 or 30 years. We need to attack both supply and demand. In that sense, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right.

I want to give the Minister as much time as possible in which to respond, but I have two or three more points to make. Obviously, DFID's strategy is to work via multilateral institutions. How will the expenditure be monitored, especially as the strategy report admits that the strategy is "high-risk"? The report also says that there will be "an independent evaluation of its effectiveness".

Who will carry out that independent evaluation? What form will it take? When will its results be reported to the House? If the Minister is prepared to sanction independent evaluation in that particular sphere, why is he not prepared to sanction it for all other significant sums spent by DFID around the world? I will be interested to hear whether he will be happy to put a provision allowing that in the private Member's Bill that he and I will discuss in a couple of weeks.

On the credibility point made by the hon. Member for Waveney, what assessment has DFID made of the effect of limited country presence and presence on the ground? If there is a criticism of DFID—and it is a well regarded organisation—it is not that it does not monitor inputs, but that it does not monitor sufficiently where money is going, particularly through multilateral organisations such as the Inter-American Development Bank and the World Bank.

Finally, what success has DFID had in reaching its common objectives with the IDB and the World Bank? Because of the relatively small amount of money that DFID put into the strategy at its inception, it was felt that there was a risk that DFID had insignificant influence, or insufficient influence to alter the policies of those two particularly powerful institutions. If DFID does not have the influence to put the focus on reducing poverty, what is plan B? What will the change in policy be if the World Bank and the IDB fail to secure transparency, effectiveness and poverty alleviation? The closure of offices removes the ladder by which we can return to a bilateral relationship with the countries involved.

10.48 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship for the first time, Mrs. Humble. I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) on securing this valuable debate.

In the almost three years in which I have been in the Department for International Development, I have had the privilege of visiting Peru, Nicaragua and, more recently, Brazil, so I, too, welcome the opportunity to discuss our strategy for Latin America with Members of the House. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's passion for Latin America and to the way in which he campaigns on the issue in the House. Also, I pay tribute—as the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) did—to the way in which my hon. Friend has chaired the all-party group on Latin America.

My hon. Friend paid tribute to a number of non-governmental organisations; the Vine Trust is just one with which he has had contact. I join him in paying tribute to it and to several other NGOs that DFID funds in the region and I hope that there will be more shortly.

My hon. Friends the Members for Waveney and for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) rightly drew attention to the continuing poverty and inequality in Latin America. As we know, 57 million people live on less than $1 a day in Latin America and the Caribbean, but the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean has gone beyond those statistics to bring home the scale of the poverty and inequality. It estimates that 43 per cent. of Latin America's population, or 222 million people, are poor and that about 19 per cent., or 96 million people, are extremely poor. The poorest countries in the region are Bolivia, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Paraguay, although only Nicaragua is officially classified as a low-income country. As all hon. Members said, however, substantial numbers of poor people also live in the large middle-income countries, such as Brazil and Mexico. The UK Government and the Department for International Development, in particular, must continue to help tackle those issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney rightly said that Latin America will be crucial to international efforts to meet the millennium development goals. So far, as the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) said, there has been pretty disappointing performance on the environmental indicators. More positively, good progress is being made on under-five mortality, access to safe water, gender equality and universal primary enrolment. Although things are moving in the right direction, hon. Members are right to stress that the international community must not allow its attention to wander from the other issues that need to be tackled.

Our approach to Latin America must be considered in the context of what other multilateral agencies and bilateral donors are doing in the region. The Inter-American Development Bank is the region's largest development partner, providing $6.8 billion in 2003. It is followed by the World Bank, which provided $5.8 billion in 2002–03. The European Commission is also a substantial donor, providing $375 million in 2004, and the UK contributes to such funds. There are also significant bilateral donors, including the US, Japan and the Spanish. It is important to recognise the scale of development assistance to the region. It is right that we prioritise our development assistance to low-income countries. That is why Africa and Asia are also a focus for the Department and why the UK's main financial contribution is made through multilateral channels.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North asked me to announce some good news. Given his extra-curricular interests and his excellent judgment on such issues, I shall try to offer him some comfort. The present prioritisation sees 90 per cent. of funding go to low-income countries and 10 per cent. to middle-income countries. In addition, we have made a commitment to achieve the 0.7 per cent. goal by 2013. That means a rising budget not only for low-income countries, but for middle-income countries. As part of the discussions that we will inevitably have with the House and the Treasury about the comprehensive spending review, we shall have to make a judgment about where those increased resources for middle-income countries should go.

Jeremy Corbyn: I thank my hon. Friend for that. Essentially, the issue in Latin America—particularly in middle-income countries such as Brazil and Mexico—is the massive disparity between wealth and poverty. Millions of people in those countries live in abject poverty, and we really must address that issue.

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Our strategy is to do just that by using our limited bilateral funding to leverage much greater spend on poverty-related programmes from multilateral organisations such as the IDB, the World Bank, the EC and the UN. We will use our limited resources to get others to be much more poverty focused.

In that context, I was delighted to go to the IDB's annual meeting and to meet its new head, President Moreno. I launched several specific trust funds with the IDB and the World Bank, which I hope will increase the access of the poor to markets and international trade, as well as securing more accountable and responsive public sector management and investment in more accountable political systems. That is one positive example of our work.

We also contribute to the IDB's multilateral investment fund. Again, we seek to increase the access of the poor to trading opportunities. Those involved will work with small institutions, slightly larger institutions, such as co-operatives, and more traditional medium-sized private sector businesses. Again, I hope that that will bear fruit and scale up the development assistance to such programmes across the region.

I have been asked several specific questions, so let me try to answer some of them in the short time available. The hon. Member for Richmond Park asked about environment programmes and recognised the scale of deforestation in the Amazon. That is one of the issues that I discussed with the director general of Brazil's environment department when I visited the country two or three weeks ago. It was encouraging to hear of a very active programme to tackle illegal logging and deforestation in the Amazon. Some of the NGOs that I met were not quite so positive, which is perhaps not surprising, but it was good to hear their words of caution. South America and central America are the only regions in the world not to have a forest law enforcement and governance programme. If Brazil, in particular, were to ask us to support such a programme, we would be delighted to do so, as we have done in Africa, central Asia and elsewhere.

[Mr. Thomas]

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney asked some specific questions about the World Bank and the IDB. In particular, he asked about the Government's support for the parliamentary network, which was established five years ago. We contribute £300,000 towards its work, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently attended one of its spring meetings. We are supporting developing countries so that they can have a stronger voice on the boards of the World Bank and other institutions.

My hon. Friend advocated that more work be done on regional integration, and that is a key part of the European Union's work with the Mercosur bloc. We are also funding research to encourage more integration in the region and to see how the trade-related aspects of such integration would impact on the poorest people there. Again, we are trying to overcome some of the suspicions about integration, to which my hon. Friend referred.

The IDB is very active on energy and infrastructure issues, and, again, we hope that some of the trust fund money that we are providing will improve the poverty focus of that work.

I recognise that I have been unable to answer all hon. Members' questions, so I shall review Hansard and, if appropriate, write to hon. Members to correct that.

Party Political Funding

11 am

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): I welcome the opportunity to raise—for the third time in the past six years—the issue of party funding. I see some of the same faces joining us for the debate.

In the past, the issue has been associated with the review by the Electoral Commission. I shall try to feed into that debate, although it will not surprise anyone that part of the motivation for calling this debate, in which a number of hon. Members will want to participate, is the fact that, despite the changes over the years and the words from previous Ministers about increased openness and transparency, we are back in the mire of—for want of a better phrase—political sleaze. There have been huge doubts about the basis on which donations are given and an even greater fall among the general public in respect for parties across the political spectrum, in terms of how they raise money and the motivations of those who give it, rightly or wrongly.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley) (Lab): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will help the debate if he can indicate whether Michael Brown was on the electoral register on the date on which he gave a donation to the Liberal Democrats and whether Mr. Brown's company, 5th Avenue Partners, was conducting business in the United Kingdom on that date, which was 10 February 2005. If the hon. Gentleman can do so, perhaps he can, on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, enlighten the Chamber about the business that 5th Avenue Partners was undertaking in the UK.

Matthew Taylor: The right hon. Gentleman intervened marginally before I was about to say that the issue has consumed all three political parties. To put it bluntly, I shall not defend the Liberal Democrats any more than I intend to defend the Conservative party or the Labour party. I am not in a position to give the detailed answers for which he asked; that is a matter for the Electoral Commission.

The episode has done the Liberal Democrats no good at all. The donations that the Conservative party has received have done them no good politically, with the embarrassments ranging from the circumstances in which a previous Conservative leader put peers into the House of Lords to the fact that, in order to maintain anonymity for some of its donors, the party had rapidly to repay £5 million rather than publish the details, let alone the scandals that have engulfed the Labour party. All the political parties have been damaged by the process. I have consistently said in this place that they will continue to be damaged as long as political parties are increasingly reliant on major donors for their funding.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I confess that I was listening to the hon. Gentleman with only half an ear, but I thought that he said that he was not going to defend the Liberal Democrats. Did I hear him right?

Matthew Taylor: It would be slightly odd if I defended the Liberal Democrats, given that I have consistently argued that political parties should not receive such major donations. The only defence that I would give is that, as long as we have a political system in which some parties receive major donations from multi-millionaires, all the parties will inevitably seek such donations in order to compete. Otherwise, parties will have to fight elections with many fewer resources than other parties and therefore they will have their arms tied behind their backs. Even as we stand, the Conservative and Labour parties spent some £17 million each in the last general election, let alone in the run-up to it. The Liberal Democrats, with one major donation, were able to spend about one quarter of that. There is an arms race and any arms race will lead to people competing for funds from donors.

I do not know what the Labour or Conservative party's track record is of refusing donations that are felt inappropriate. The Liberal Democrats turned down £1 million in 1997, which was the only major donation that we were offered, because we did not feel it appropriate. The donation would not have been illegal, nor was there any requirement to turn it down—at that stage, we would not even have been required to publish the fact that we had received such a donation. We turned down the offer because we felt that it would not have been right to accept it from Mohamed Al Fayed. That is a matter of public record.

If the question is asked, "Do you believe that it is a good thing for us to accept Michael Brown's donation?" my answer is no. If the question is asked, "Do you believe from what you now know of what happened"—and that is no more than the right hon. Member for Warley (Mr. Spellar) knows—"that it would have been better to refuse it?" my answer is yes. However, the same can be said of the donations to both the other political parties. My hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) will speak officially on behalf of the Liberal Democrats in a minute, so hon. Members might want to direct questions to him. As long as all the political parties rely on such sources of funding, we shall continue to see such problems.

If I wanted to, I could spend 20 minutes to half an hour talking the Chamber through details of the Labour and Conservative parties' record on such donations, but that would not be helpful. We all know the scale of the problem. It is also noticeable that hon. Members from both sides of the House, many with direct experience of such work at the highest level in their party, say that the present situation is unacceptable and cannot continue.

Mr. Spellar: Fortunately, we have been joined by the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes), who might be able to add some information. The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) knew that he would introduce this debate, but he has been remarkably incurious about the obvious questions. There is a difference: both the Conservative and Labour parties are not aware of any suggestion that their current donations have come from improper sources, in that they were potentially illegal owing to the domestic status of either the individual or the company. I return to my question: could the hon. Gentleman say whether Mr. Brown or his companies were legally in the position to make that donation? If not, perhaps the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey, who is president of the Liberal Democrats and therefore at the heart of the party, could enlighten him and the rest of us.

Matthew Taylor: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey will do that, but I understand that the Electoral Commission has looked at the issue and has so far been pleased that the answer is yes.

Mr. Spellar: It has not decided.

Matthew Taylor: The position so far is as I described, but the commission continues to investigate. However, my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey might want to add some information.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I am happy to deal with the question, not least so that my hon. Friend can get on with making his argument. The donation was given and checks were carried out. The test was whether the company was trading and it was believed on the evidence that it was. The evidence has been given to the Electoral Commission, which has carried out a check and believes that the test has been satisfied. The commission has not come to a final view, but it has given us a definitive view, which is that the action was perfectly legal from all that it knows.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): For the record, I note that there are four parties represented in the Chamber, not three. Without climbing on too high a horse, I should like to ask the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) to confirm that his remarks refer to three and not four parties.

Matthew Taylor: The Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru have received major donations in the past. The same applies across the board, although I do not know whether any donations have been received in illegal circumstances. We have heard public criticism from Members on both sides of the House, including from leading Members who are in a position to know. We have read the Labour party treasurer's comments about the extraordinary fact that he was not informed that such loans were being made. Bluntly, it is inconceivable to suggest that the idea that donations should be given in the form of loans was anything other than an attempt to make secret what was happening. The fact that those donations then led to peerages makes the situation worse.

We have seen, however, the same on the Conservative side. I was pleased that a former chairman of the Conservative party, Lord Fowler, said that it was unacceptable for things to continue as they were. We must remember the comments that were made when a peerage was awarded to Michael Ashcroft. The former leader of the Conservative party in the Lords said that the award was "an affront to the dignity and the standing of the party".

The former leader of the Conservative party said:

"It has lowered the whole standing of our political institutions throughout the world".

[Matthew Taylor]

He went on to say that clearly the £3million donation to the Conservative party must have been for some purpose, and, in his words,

"and now we see what the purpose was."

The issue has without doubt lowered the public standing of the political parties and, on those grounds alone, the House should seek an end to it. I depart from the proposals for a cap at 50,000 made both by the Conservative party—its views are now rather different from those argued on its behalf in the last two debates on the subject—and by my own party. It is evident that one family could still make a donation of a size that would be of considerable influence on political parties, particularly if it were a repeat donation year after year.

The rules should be simple. Donations should not be at a level that could conceivably influence a political party. To me, that would suggest a limit of £10,000 rather than £50,000. At least we are talking about a ballpark figure that is different from the donations of £5 million or £3 million that both the other main political parties have received, or even the £2 million or so that the Liberal Democrats have received.

It seems evident that whatever is said, when donations take place on such a scale in a political system in which elections can be closely fought and expenditure by the biggest political parties is on a scale of £10 million, £15 million or £20 million, donations of £5 million will influence or potentially influence those who need them in order to fund their political campaigns.

As I have argued before, an even bigger potential distortion results from such major donations. In 1997, one individual spent £20 million on setting up from scratch and running a political party, the Referendum party, which did not have a base of individual support at the start of the process, at least. He was able to do so in a way that significantly affected the size of the Conservative defeat. In a different election campaign, such as the one in 1992, the result of the general election would have almost certainly changed on the whim of one individual. That cannot be right either. At present, we have nothing that would stop such an individual affecting political outcomes in such a way.

Over the past few weeks, considerable attention has been given to the British National party. It fights elections with little money, few members and little support. It fights nasty, intimidating elections on the doorstep. Just imagine what its campaigns would be like if the person who funded the Referendum party had instead decided to put £20 million into the BNP.

When those who argue against state funding say, "What would happen if the BNP were funded?"—I will talk a little about what I think that we should put in place—let us not forget that on the whim of one individual, the BNP could fight these local elections, the next European elections or the following general election with a fund of £10 million, £15 million, £20 million or £100 million. There is nothing to stop that. In a democracy such as ours, we should be aware that in a world in which increasingly large numbers of people make substantial sums of money, the chances of maverick individuals of one sort or another—not least those maverick individuals who might choose to fund the Liberal Democrats—putting money behind one political party or another, or perhaps behind an extreme political force, and changing the outcome by force of cash rather than force of political argument or anything else, should be taken extremely seriously. We should seek to limit that. No system perfectly protects democracy, but the present one clearly does not.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Earlier on, the hon. Gentleman's argument seemed to be that certain people might, through the use of cash, exert influence on those who were likely—or perhaps less, in his case—to form a Government. Now he seems to be saying he objects to the very fact that people with a lot of money can back a political party, even one that stands no prospect of forming a Government. Would he cast his mind back to Saturday, when there was a substantial demonstration in London against the BNP? Does he believe that influencing against a party is as bad as influencing for a party?

Matthew Taylor: I believe that, in a functioning democracy, we should build on the support that we can win from individuals. That obviously needs cash, but it can be done through small donations and small contributions. It should not be in the power of an individual to bias political outcomes because they happen to be able to write a very large cheque.

There are two issues. The first is the power of the individual, on a maverick decision, to make a donation here or there that will affect political outcomes. That could make the difference between winning or losing an election such as the 1992 general election. It is perfectly apparent that had the Referendum party fought in 1992 rather than 1997, we would have had a different general election outcome entirely. It is also about an individual's willingness to support an extreme force. I doubt that the BNP would win any parliamentary seats if it gained £20 million—I certainly hope not—but it could affect the outcome by pulling votes from another political party or by massively increasing the risk of racial tension, racial violence, rioting and so on in the areas where those resources were used to campaign.

The second issue is about the diminution of the respect for, and standing of, political parties and the political process when honours are bought and sold. Honours have always been bought and sold. Few hereditary peers in the House of Lords were there for anything other than a favour at one time or another. The great majority of the appointed peers are there because of the political contribution they have made to one party or another, in one way or another. They may have actively pursued a career of support for their party—they are unlikely to be there for being an active maverick—or have made a major donation. That is the reality. If the House of Lords is elected in the future, as I hope it will be, those favours will still be transferred in other ways.

I will give an example of somebody who has refused any kind of peerage or gong. Stuart Wheeler has made it clear that he has attached his donations to not getting a title. Nevertheless, we know that he sought to influence the political stance of the party and who was its leader. There is no doubt that somebody who has a large chequebook is more likely to exercise that influence than an ordinary member who raises funds for the party by boiling up jam and selling it at the local jumble sale. We all know that takes place even though it should not happen in theory.

We have seen that happen even from a Government who came in determined to clean things up. We have seen them fall into exactly the same traps as their predecessors. It is rather a surprise to us all to have this debate in the context of what has emerged from the last general election, because we all probably felt that things had been better cleaned up after 1997. There was a degree of consensus on that and a feeling that transparency would at least change things. We now know that the process has been more transparent, but that the public do not like what they see. When the political parties discovered that the public did not like what they saw, they tried to cover it up again by finding routes around the rules. Let us clear it up.

There is a third, fundamental reason why we should look to change. At the moment, we have the worst of all worlds. We have all the scandal and parties determined to try to find £2 million, £3 million or £5 million donations but, at the same time, we see a creeping increase in state funding. The public are putting in money, but they are not getting anything in return in terms of a cleaner political system. They are just adding to the arms race, a little like mortgage interest relief added to house price increases. As long as more houses are not being built, all such relief does is add to the price and it does not help anyone buy anything, but the state merely subsidises yet more increases in land value.

In this case, state funding has not stopped the political race for funding but added to the level of expenditure by all political parties. It has done so in a way that rewards the status quo. The money is tied to the existing political establishment on the basis of past political performance. In fact, all three parties do quite well out of it, and all will have views on how the other parties do. I know that the Liberal Democrats feel that we are a little hard done by. The Tories have made representations in the past to say that the official Opposition should get more money than other Opposition parties, including the Welsh and Scottish nationalists. Everyone has a view on that, but the truth is that such funding rewards the status quo. Those who have the seats—those who previously received the votes—receive funding through Short money and so on.

I genuinely welcome the fact that the Conservative party has changed its position, because it sometimes used to indulge in the most bizarre hypocrisy. I read an article by a former deputy chairman of the Conservative party a few years ago in which he opposed the principle of state funding, yet in the same year the Conservative party received the majority of its funding from the state when compared with donations—some £4 million in direct funding support from the state and the £3.5 million that the party raised in donations.

We are seeing a growth in donations, but the public are getting nothing in return. We need to watch what happens over the coming months, because I am extremely concerned that we will see another rather cosy deal for the establishment—including the Liberal Democrats—in which the status quo is further rewarded in return for, at last, the cut in the donations and expenditure that has taken place.

For me, the debate is not about what has happened with the three main parties. I am not saying that one party is better than the others—they are not. Some parties have bigger opportunities than others, and Governments will always be under the spotlight for giving favours because they in a position to do the most favours. Parties such as mine will always be under the spotlight for hypocrisy because we hardly ever receive donations; we seem to be whiter than white until we do, but we are no more able to turn down donations than the others. The same goes for Plaid Cymru and the Scottish National party.

We are all in the same mess, and we need to find a solution. To replace the funding raised by the political parties would probably cost 40p per elector each year. That is what it would cost to clean up the act. The crucial thing is that we should not be given yet more Short money, yet more policy development money or yet more money to reward the established parties. It is crucial in a functioning democracy that politics should be changed by the power of the people.

Support for the parties ebbs and flows; sometimes it goes towards the Conservatives, sometimes towards Labour and sometimes towards others. The political system is in a process of genuine change, and none of us knows what politics or the party structure might look like in 10, 20 or 30 years. It is vital that the parties should follow the public mood rather than dominating it, because the funding of established parties is based on that establishment. I have consistently argued that funding should be tied to the public support of members and supporters who make small-scale donations—match funding at the local level. That is important not only because of the establishment of the political parties, but also because of the fall in electoral turnout and political activity, of which all hon. Members are aware.

For some years, parties have been responding to that by almost ceasing to campaign in their safest constituencies and concentrating their resources, particularly their manpower, on the marginal seats. At the last election, the Conservative party probably used information technology and direct mail more effectively than any other party. Party activists were replaced with expenditure on phone calls, direct mail and so on; the activists were not really needed. It is therefore hardly surprising that the activist base for all political parties is now about 10 per cent. of what it was in the 1950s. Indeed, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has more members than all the political parties put together.

We can see that happening in party headquarters. I shall give as an example the figures cited in a previous debate. I am sure that the more recent figures will not be very different—and they are true for all parties. In 1991, the Conservative party had 147 central staff and 59 in the regions. By 2002, there were 172 central staff but only 18 in the regions. The reason is that political campaigns are fought less through the activist base or through local members; instead, central office is raising cheques for £5 million here and £3 million there, and loans for God knows how much behind the scenes—and spending that centrally to replicate what might otherwise have happened in the constituencies.

If we tied state funding to declared party members and supporters, it would make some fundamental changes. First, we would refocus political parties on generating local activity, membership and support in order to raise the money. We could then focus on building up membership and support in the safe seats as well as in the marginals. It is in the safe seats that we can build up the funding support. That will not only start building up the membership as a whole, but it would start to address the fact that political parties neglect whole chunks of the country on the grounds that "We will never win there" or "We are always going to win there."

Secondly, it would ensure a dynamic system that reflected the ebb and flow of support. If the Labour party was as unpopular as it might prove to be on Thursday, it would find it harder to attract members, supporters and donations. Political parties that offered an alternative would find it easier. If the Green party started to build up its membership, it would be able to bring in more support for its campaigns, and rightly so.

Support for the British National party would be based not on the fact that it polled 800,000 votes in the European elections, but on whether it could get people to register publicly that they were members of the party and that they made donations to it. If the BNP were able to get tens of thousands of people to register, it would probably be as entitled as any other party in a democracy to receive funding, but we all know that that is extremely unlikely. The fact is that people do not wish to register their support, and much of the support that the BNP receives is not directly for the party but is an anti-vote against other parties.

Tying support to individuals in that way would answer the big questions. It would ensure that we did not reward the status quo, which is fundamental in a democracy, and it would clean up the act. It would not be perfect. State support for parties would be difficult to enforce, and people would always be trying to get round the rules at the margin, but the tougher the rules—the more clear-cut it is that parties could not accept major donations—the more likely the system is to be successful. It is a little like anything to do with the law; there will always be those who seek to break the law, but if the laws are not put in place, it will be a free-for-all.

At the moment, we have an inglorious free-for-all, which is undermining democratic principles, and taxpayers are spending more and more on political parties and getting nothing in return. We need to clean up the act. If we do not change the system, the bad news that we have seen over recent weeks in the Labour party and to some extent with the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats will be repeated more often, and political membership, party support and activity and electoral turnout will decline. We have the opportunity to change that, and I hope that the House takes it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): Order. I anticipate that the contributions from those on the Front Bench will start at 12 noon, so Back Benchers have just over half an hour. I urge right hon. and hon. Members to be brief.

11.28 am

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): At present, the country has an increasingly profound sense of anti-politics. Whether that is the fault of the political parties or the result of the predominance of media glosses on political activity is perhaps immaterial.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing this debate. He said that political party membership is tiny compared with what it used to be a few years ago. That has profound implications for the ability of political parties actively to pursue activities outside the minimum of fighting elections in any part of the country, or even to concentrate their forces on those seats that might be won.

The parties increasingly operate in response to large donations, loans and other forms of funding, rather than in response to the traditional way of raising money from party members. Indeed last year, only 13 per cent. of the Labour party's income and only 6 per cent. of the Conservative party's income came from membership dues. We are not about to become a country where the political party system is liable to break down. However, the system is, in terms of the ability of parties to do very much to engineer the political life of the country, close to tipping point. If that tipping point is reached, we will end up with a country that perhaps has what looks like political parties functioning, but in fact those parties will be elite organisations. Elections will be a parade of two or three elites before a population that otherwise has no involvement whatever in the process.

That will have profound implications for the democratic life of the country. Whether we like them or not, political parties are the guarantee that we have an electoral system that is genuinely competitive, that can involve far more people in the process of not only deciding the outcome of elections but participating in politics between elections, and that can avoid the idea either of us moving to an American system of the capture of parties just for electoral purposes, or of parties that involve merely the elites in London and the other large metropolises and that cease to exist elsewhere.

The second danger that we face—indeed, we have gone a considerable way down this path already—is that the participation with which political parties have historically concerned themselves between elections is replaced by an electoral apartheid whereby parties are responsible only for the representative issues with regard to elections and participation is something else entirely. For example, the only way in which someone can now be appointed to a wide range of public bodies is if they are regarded as representative; it is not that they are a representative. Part of the sine qua non of someone being regarded as representative is that they have had no involvement ever with a political party. Only then can someone be regarded as representative and be appointed to such a body.

It is remarkable and significant that the Electoral Commission has as one of its operating rules that no one who has had any involvement with a political party for the past 10 years can be employed by or in any way involved with the Electoral Commission. The body that regulates how political parties work has by definition an ordinance of denial of any political involvement of anyone who is judging political parties. That seems to be the beginning of a strange situation for our political parties.

The almost pathological response of political parties whereby they increasingly rely on donations and loans to fund their activities is a danger that goes beyond the inter-party badinage and debate about who has done worse out of that and who has broken rules or sailed closer to the wind than other parties. The issue underpins the future of how we run our democratic processes as a whole.

People are contemplating a future of either centralised parties competing in the elite way suggested or of what we have seen in recent surveys. One conducted by a former Member of Parliament, Peter Bradley, showed the extent to which funding has been placed in local political parties as a simulacrum of local activity and has enabled activity to take place as if it were local activity but in fact is entirely centrally directed activity. That is a further danger to our political system.

That is the context in which we should consider state funding. We are talking about state funding for the health of our polity, not for the continuation of particular functions that already exist as far as political parties are concerned. It is only recently that political parties have entered the constitution, in the sense of being mentioned in any way in legislation or regulated in any way. It would be ironic if, just as political parties entered the constitution, they ceased to exist in the form for which they were regulated in the constitution.

It is true that political parties already receive a substantial element of state funding. That essentially reinforces the role of elite political parties, rather than dispersing that role. Therefore, when it comes to considering state funding over and above that way of doing things, we must consider the local. How can political parties outside that elite function facilitate political life and political participation—the role that political parties play outside the process of merely securing people for elections? How can that role be strengthened for the health of the polity? The debate must therefore be about how local political funding with state assistance can be secured.

I am attracted to some of the ideas in the report of the Power commission, which might feature in our debate today. There is the idea, for example, that people casting their vote should receive a voucher that they can then—publicly, I hope—exchange for a certain amount of local political funding for the party of their choice. That underpins the value of going to the polls in the first place and relates the popularity of a party, and the way in which it has operated at local level to secure particular votes, to how the party might be funded.

The framework within which I am making my remarks does not enter on trying to preserve a two or three-party system. In countries where state aid has been centralised, there are circumstances in which political parties that in effect have no function whatever in the state continue to receive funding as if they did. It is essential not to fall into that trap with state funding. Funding that enables the ebb and flow of party support to be recognised and that, overall, underpins the essential nature of the party political process for the health of the polity is the right way forward. If we frame our debate in that way, perhaps the role of anti-politics in deriding the role of political parties as regards the health of our democracy might recede to the extent that a political state that enables the party political debate to be conducted at both national and local level on the basis of a healthy level of funding, with acceptance of that funding as legitimate by the public, might just be a way forward.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I shall respond to your injunction to be brief, Mrs. Humble, but I want to compliment the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) on a thoughtful speech on an area on which he has made many contributions. He rightly stressed the importance to our democratic system of political parties. They are often derided, but are a precondition for a healthy system.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on his choice of subject. He may have applied for the debate before the more recent sensational developments in the Michael Brown case but, as he said, we all have our crosses to bear on this subject and we have a mutual interest in moving towards a settlement.

Quite a lot has happened since we had the previous debate on the subject on 8 November 2005. The Electoral Commission has proposed changes to the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 in respect of loans, and the Government have suddenly decided that this is an area on which they want to make progress. We understand that discussions have taken place between the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) has published his excellent document as a contribution to the debate. I was interested to see the foreword by the Leader of the Opposition, saying that our Green Paper proposals are set out in detail and that there is a shared responsibility on political leaders to ensure clean politics in this country. The Constitutional Affairs Committee has begun an inquiry, as has the Public Administration Committee.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will get a better response at the end of the debate than the one I received previously from the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs, the right hon. and learned Member for Camberwell and Peckham (Ms Harman). I asked her:

> "Do the Government intend to respond formally to the Electoral Commission's report and, if so, by what date?"

The answer I got was:

> "We will respond in due course, but I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a specific time."

I initiated that debate 11 months after the Electoral Commission published its report on the funding of political parties, and in the intervening period the Government have provided no response, or time for debate on that document. It would appear that six months ago, the Government did not think the matter frightfully important or urgent.

[Sir George Young]

There was a ray of hope, because in her winding-up speech, the Minister of State said:

"As a new Minister in the Department for Constitutional Affairs, I can get involved in this important debate."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 8 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 19–21WH.]

Sadly, shortly afterwards, her husband erupted at being excluded from key decisions on Labour party funding, and she is no longer involved in this important debate. I do not blame her for that decision, which I think was sensible, but it meant that a new Minister has had to get up to speed on the subject.

We are dependent yet again on a Back-Bench Opposition MP providing a forum for debate. My views are on the record and I shall not repeat them. My starting point was the Neill committee report on standards in public life—specifically its recommendations 38 and 39, which dealt with tax relief by deduction at source for donations up to £500 a year for parties that received at least 150,000 votes. That was one of the few recommendations of the report that the Government did not accept. There was all-party support for it in the lower House at the time and, speaking from memory, the Government were defeated on the issue in the upper House, but refused to budge.

In his proposals, my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester has removed a potential objection from the Labour party, which argued that that recommendation penalised parties with large numbers of non-taxpayers. My hon. Friend proposed extending the benefit to non-taxpayers and increasing the cap from £500 to £3,000, making it of greater benefit to political parties. I hope that the Government will indicate that they have abandoned their opposition to such help and are prepared to negotiate.

One recommendation that we should revisit is the one dealing with the cap on national campaign spending. We have had two general elections since the Neill report and there are now good grounds for reviewing that recommendation. Neill proposed a cap of £20 million for the 2001 general election. I ask myself what would have happened last year if the Labour and Conservative parties had spent the same amount on the campaign as the Liberal Democrats. Would it have made much difference? I suspect that the answer is no. We could have a much lower national cap on what is spent at general elections.

Where do we go from here? I have two final points. At the end of the day, all MPs have to make a political judgment. On one hand, the polling evidence tells us that people do not like taxpayers' money going to political activities. On the other hand, they do not like what is happening at the moment, where parties are dependent on large donations.

Matthew Taylor: On that point, it depends on how the question is phrased. Polling has been carried out asking people whether they want state funding in order to clean up the act. There is majority support for state funding if that could be achieved.

Sir George Young: I am relieved to hear that, but if the hon. Gentleman talks to Members of Parliament, he will find that they see it as a question of which side of the argument is more powerful. I am more worried about the downside of further disengagement and disenchantment with the political process through the sort of stories we have heard in the past few weeks than I am by the downside of the unpopularity of funding our democratic process with taxpayers' money. We should find offsetting economies, as my hon. Friend has done in his paper. Some may be found in how we run the Palace of Westminster. We should link such support to promote broad-based political parties. My party is a decentralised party; I am sure that that is the way in which we should proceed. We should reduce substantially what can be spent on national campaigns.

What we need from this debate is not a Government statement on their policies—that would be a wild dream. We want a framework and a time scale for taking decisions. It is a scandal that 18 months after the Electoral Commission reported, the Government have not replied. What options are the Government interested in and which, if any, have they ruled out? When will the next step be taken and how will Parliament be involved? An area where decisions are taken in secret has got a lot of people into trouble. I hope that we can have some transparency this afternoon.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): To say that this debate is timely would be an understatement, even for myself—given as I am to understatement. All political parties have to tread very carefully in this matter, and I am certainly not going to climb on my high horse this morning. My party has no outstanding loans, apart from the one that we have for our building from HSBC. It used to be said that Plaid Cymru was not even worth bribing. Apparently, we are no longer worth lending money to, either.

I shall raise two points to contextualise the issue. As the Member representing Caernarfon, there is a direct line from me to Lloyd George, who had a hand in such proceedings in the past. During the debate on the honours system on Thursday, I made the point that Lloyd George took a clear view on the matter. Through his agents, he was a robust salesman of honours, and he used that money to fund his political activities in the 1920s and 1930s. That is rather like the situation today, but contrasts with the situation in the 1990s when individual gain was the motive.

My other point relates to an experience I had in America about three years ago, when I took part in an excellent visit organised by the British-American parliamentary group. I spent a few days with a Republican congressman on the west coast. During the course of a fundraising evening, he asked me how much I had spent on my last election campaign, and I naïvely said, "About 10". He said, "10 million?", and I said, "10,000". We do not want to go down that road. On that night—a very modest evening—he raised $88,000, but he also told me that 95 per cent. of his spending went on television advertising. If he could put that genie back into the bottle, he would certainly do so, as would the other US political parties.

I hope that those points are useful and that they contextualise some of the debate. I shall raise some points about the Welsh context, which I think will be useful. The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) referred to extremist parties. The National Front has stood for election in Wales, but its foul ruminations have not attracted much support. However, I refer hon. Members to the European elections, where, in my constituency, the vote was split between Plaid Cymru and the UK Independence party. Now, UKIP is probably not in the same field as the British National party, but as a party that took a strong view on the European situation, it could have attracted a good deal of support throughout Wales, and perhaps even have got a Member elected. That is also the case in respect of the Welsh Assembly. I draw hon. Members' attention to the fact that we have regional list seats, and it is possible that extremist parties that attract a certain amount of support and a great deal of money could get in.

In Wales, we are affected by the political debates in the UK as a whole, which disadvantages parties such as mine that operate in Wales, a country where people turn on their TVs and watch electoral broadcasts from England. Moreover, 85 per cent. of the newspapers in Wales come from England; the local press is very small. I am not complaining, but that is the context. We have seen glossy party political broadcasts, which influence people in Wales in the same way as they influence those in England.

I make this plea: if we are to go down the local and membership-based route, other political parties in Wales must provide a certain amount of transparency. I refer briefly to the fact that the accounts filed by the Labour party no longer distinguish between Wales and England. Rather gleefully, my party has said that the Labour party in Wales does not exist. I understand that the Labour party spent about £1 million in Wales, and it is alleged that about half of that came from England—it was not raised locally. That touches on the point raised by an earlier speaker: local strength and fundraising should be reflected more adequately. The other parties spent large amounts of money: £850,000 by the Conservatives, and £250,000 by the Liberal Democrats. My party spent £38,000.

There should be a national cap on donations—Welsh national as well as UK national. We need a system that recognises the particular local or, in my case, national context. There should be a cap of £5,000 on individual donations, and the state should provide some match funding, but on a sliding scale. If one were to contribute £100, there could be £100 matching; and if one were to contribute £5,000, there could be £150 matching. That is what we commend to the Chamber and to anyone considering these matters, such as Sir Hayden Phillips.

This debate is often presented as a choice between state funding or funding by rich men—and it is usually men. That is usually the offer: either we have large amounts of money or state funding. There is a third way, and I commend the reliance on membership, which is the route that my party takes, and the reliance on local support.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): I agree almost entirely with the analysis put forward by the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor). We could spend this hour and a half scoring party points off each other, but it would be a terrible waste of time. We all have this problem, and if we have to raise money to pay for party politics, it is much easier for party treasurers to raise it in large donations. That leads to an unsavoury series of events, whereby Ministers have to turn up at dinners and people think that they have access. It gives at least the appearance of corruption, even if there is none in reality.

Party politics needs funding, however, and where I part company from the hon. Gentleman and, I think, everybody else who has spoken is over the concept of compulsory taxpayer funding. I do not see why people who are uninterested in politics or do not care for a particular party should have to pay through their tax system for its activities.

How does one square that circle? We could go on the way we are, but if we raise funds voluntarily, they will come from big donations. Or, is there an alternative to compulsory taxpayer funding? I think the answer is yes. There is a similar system in the United States. People could in their tax returns or in their tax coding agree entirely voluntarily to give a sum of money to a matching fund administered by the Electoral Commission. I shall come on to how it would be used.

In the United States, one can tick a box on one's tax return and give about $5 to a presidential election fund. Presidential candidates who use it are subject to certain conditions about transparency and the maximum donations that they can accept.

The scheme would be voluntary for political parties, because there is a freedom of speech issue. Much as I resent what James Goldsmith did in the 1997 election, I am not sure that someone should be stopped from doing it, because it is one way in which people from outside the political elite can break into it. To participate in match funding, a party would have to agree that it would not accept any donations over a certain size. In my view, that would be £10,000. I think that £50,000 is far too much. It may not seem a lot to us or a party treasurer, but to most of our constituents, £50,000 is a huge pile of money. I am not sure that they would consider its donation any less corrupt than £100,000 or £200,000. My limit would be £10,000, but if people wanted it to be £15,000 or £5,000, I would not argue.

If the party agreed not to take any donations in excess of £10,000, it would be eligible for the pot of match funding. For all donations it raised under the limit, it would be entitled to one-for-one match funding out of the pot. Few people will give £10,000, but in our constituencies there will be plenty of people who give £10, £20 or whatever. The aggregate of those donations should be matched pound for pound out of the match funding pot.

That proposal is different from taxpayer funding or tax relief on membership subscriptions or donations. Tax relief is compulsory taxpayer funding; it comes out of the other taxpayers' taxes, because less comes from the people making political donations. Both systems represent compulsory taxpayer funding.

Let us say that the figure that one could check on one's tax return or coding and give voluntarily was £2.50. There are 27 million income tax payers in the United Kingdom. If 30 per cent. of them agreed to give £2.50 each, the pot of match funding would amount to about £20 million a year. I realise that the arithmetic may be slightly more complicated, but over an electoral cycle that is about what the three main political parties spend every year. It costs the Labour party and the Conservatives about £12 million a year to run their central organisations, and they spend another £20 million in an election year on top of that. The Liberal Democrat figures are less—about £5 million a year over the electoral cycle.

If 30 per cent. of taxpayers were prepared to pay an additional £2.50 on their taxes into a matching fund, £20 million would be available to pay half the total party political bills for running the parties' central organisations and general election campaigns. It would throw back on to the party the need to raise their share—in our case, £10 million a year—of that in small donations, of which most would be much less than £10,000. It would be a good thing, because it would make us go back to our grass roots. It is an alternative to the compulsory taxpayer funding that I sense all parties are drifting towards. Raiding the taxpayers' pot is too comfortable a solution and too easy. My party should be the last to do that, because we are in favour of lower taxes and less public funding and more voluntarism. Indeed, on this matter, we are probably joined by the other two parties.

My solution is worth exploring. Everyone benefits. First, there would be no more large political party donations, which are the cause of the problem. Secondly, there would be no compulsory taxpayer funding, which would be widely resented if not by the taxpayers, at least by the press, who would give us a terrible time about it. Thirdly, it would give a big incentive for us to raise small donations. As a member of the public, it would mean a great deal for me to remove the big donors from politics. Then perhaps peerages could go back to people of genuine distinction.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing this timely debate and highlighting a huge problem in the body politic. I shall focus on the relationship between party funding and political engagement.

We cannot separate the issue of party funding from party spending. The amounts spent at general elections seem a complete anathema to most people in the street. Much has been said about the restrictions on television and radio advertising, which are a very good thing in our society. However, the media world has changed over the past few years. In the past decade, there has been a huge increase in outdoor advertising such as billboards, ambient media and print advertising. It may be worth revisiting the restrictions on advertising in order to cover some of those other categories. Otherwise, as has been mentioned, we shall not engage people more in politics, but encourage an arms race in which one party spends £5 million on billboard advertising so the other party feels that it has to buy £5 million of advertising on billboards, too.

I have yet to meet a voter who is convinced by a billboard to vote in a particular way. When I speak to people, I often find that personal engagement is most effective. That was what I found when I was a marketing manager. Face-to-face marketing is the most impactful. It is not necessarily the most expensive method either, but if one is going to get volunteers to knock on doors, it is incredibly resource-intensive.

I am sure that other Members in the Chamber have had the same experience as I have of knocking on a door and speaking to a voter who says, "Do you know, you're the first politician that's ever come and knocked on my door?" Although we are delighted to have knocked on their door, equally we feel bad for the thousands of other householders in that constituency to whom we will not be able to speak. Even in my constituency, which was a target seat for the Liberal Democrats, we did not knock on every door. I would be surprised if there were many constituencies where parties are able to do that. That is a result of the decline in political membership and participation that has already been mentioned.

Given that situation, I am attracted by ways in which we could use party funding to put right what is wrong with our political system and to start to engage people better in democracy. The Power report makes a good recommendation, No. 20, which proposes a voter voucher scheme, whereby when casting a vote, one can tick a box to donate £3 each year to the party of one's choice. Interestingly enough, that may not be the party for which one votes. With our rather warped first-past-the-post political system, people in many constituencies will choose to give their vote to a party that has a good chance of winning, though they may have an affiliation with a different party. This would give them the choice to vote for the result that they want but in the meantime to support the development of a party that they may think is not yet ready to govern or to win the election.

Such a system would give an incentive to parties to engage at the local level. It is a great shame that that has been lost from the current system of party funding. The other advantage of such a system is that it would provide voters with a choice. Some people have suggested that there may not be public support for state party funding, but this would at least give people the choice of ticking the box or leaving it blank, with the money going back to the taxpayer.

This is an interesting issue, and the suggestion is worth considering. The match funding ideas that the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) suggested are worth looking at, and I hope that the Minister will address them, as it is vital that we deal with the issue properly to encourage more participation and to have a healthy political system.

12 noon

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I am happy to take part in this debate. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor), I am not a frequent participant in debates of this sort. When he gave me a little file the other day and said, "Now that you have taken on the job of speaking for us on constitutional affairs, you may find this of interest," I had not realised how many speeches he had made. I am persuaded by the approach that he has pursued throughout, which has produced a good-tempered and sensible debate on what is, clearly, a controversial issue. We could all be on the back foot and in difficulties, but instead we all have a common interest.

I also discovered that there are some fairly regular contributors to these debates: the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) and the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) have consistently criticised the present system and made arguments for change, as have the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) and others. Many people have argued that, first, we must have significant change; secondly, it must come soon; thirdly, we must reduce the influence of big donors; fourthly, we must engage in local political activity; and fifthly, if we get it right, we could refresh our democracy, which is also perceived as being in crisis. I shall say things that support that approach.

This issue has been languishing on a back burner. As the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire said, the Electoral Commission produced a good report. It went to the Government and sat there. Nothing happened—we have all been waiting. It is one of the ironies of politics that it was the husband of a relevant Minister—the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs—who opened the box. I pay tribute to Mr. Jack Dromey, a resident of Southwark, who got the debate going again. He never was a quiet man. He made what will probably be remembered as his most significant contribution, and he was right to do so. I do not say that in a partisan sense.

Let me deal with other things that are still up in the air. We are now in the middle of a series of inquiries. My party and the other parties—Plaid Cymru, the Scottish National party, the Conservatives and Labour—will give their views to the two Select Committee inquiries that have been launched. Lord Falconer gave his first evidence the other day to the Constitutional Affairs Committee, which is chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), and the Public Administration Committee will consider the issue as well. Everybody will give evidence.

Sir Hayden Phillips has been brought back into the picture to consider the matter again. The Minister and I debated the honours system in this very Chamber the other day. We discovered that there had been radical and good Select Committee reports on reforming the honours system, and then Sir Hayden Phillips was asked to come up with some proposals. The Government have been much more willing to accept his proposals, which were less radical than those of the Public Administration Committee. I hope that they will not now be timid about responding. Obviously, we will not get final answers until later this year.

For the record, it is only fair that I explain my party's position. I shall keep within my 10 minutes. We have not debated the matter or formulated policy since 2000, and much water has passed under the bridge since then. At that time, we endorsed the view that UK parties should receive a modest injection of state aid. I note in passing that a great deal of money is already available. My hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell made that point well, and we all agree about that.

We said that state funding should be broadly related to votes gained in the previous general election and the number of seats to be fought, as is the practice in many other European states. For regional parties—I interpret this to mean parties in Wales and Scotland—it would be based on performance in the relevant area. We believe that funding should go hand in hand with curbs on total national spending by parties on election campaigns, and that the limit for a general election should be £10 million. Finally, payment of state funds to political parties must be made conditional on publication of full accounts, particularly the source of all donations over £1,000. My party and the Conservative party said nothing about the issue in our manifestos for the last general election. The Labour party made some general statements, but the debate was not formally taken on.

What are the issues now? I shall identify them and give views expressed in recent days on behalf of my party by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), who is the new leader of my party, by me and by other colleagues.

First, we must separate party political donations from seats in Parliament. We made that point in the debate in this Chamber the other day. It is clear that that link and the perception of it must end. Clearly, it is damaging the health of the body politic. My view is that we ought therefore to have no further nominations to the House of Lords until the issue has completely been sorted out; that is, until we receive the Phillips report, see what it recommends, and agree on how we should proceed.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if the perception could be removed—and, of course, the reality, where it exists—there would be less objection to people giving large donations to political parties? The perception might be removed if donations were put into a blind trust that could be administered by, for example, the Electoral Commission.

Simon Hughes: That is a constructive and positive suggestion. I know that it is being discussed elsewhere, and my party would welcome such an approach. Of course, there is an argument that people should be free to do with their money what they will. If they want to give it to political parties, they should be able to do so, but such donations should not be seen to influence things. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion would be a way of dealing with that. It does not deal with some of the other criticisms made by my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell, but it is a possibility.

For the moment, though, we should not make nominations to the Lords until it is clear that we are all comfortable with the system. The Government made a commitment to trying to get reform of the Lords quickly, and I hope that we can reach agreement. On behalf of my party, I repeat the pledge that we will be constructive in trying to get an agreement. In my view, the Lords must have a majority of elected Members—that is the only ground for consensus—and then there are much more complicated issues to deal with about powers and so on.

Everybody is now agreed that loans as well as gifts must be included. Amendments to the Electoral Administration Bill, which will be debated in the House of Lords later this month, have already been tabled. We must change the code of ministerial conduct. Whatever the truth—I am not suggesting that there has been any impropriety—there appears to be a conflict of interest if Ministers, whether actual or potential, are big donors. We must change that.

The last points that I want to make are about some important linked issues. My hon. Friend was absolutely right to say that, because of the combination of the political, electoral and funding systems, money is spent in only a few places in all elections. That is the case for general elections, and he will know, as I do—I have been around the country in the past two months—that it is just the same for local elections. Target seats are fought over, and often the rest of the local authority area is not visited by any politician at all. We must get everybody engaged. We need a system that rewards people who are not in target seats. Of course, that will involve changing the electoral system so that every vote counts. The other parties must deal with this serious issue, or we will not address the malaise.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) discussed advertising. The costs of literature and campaigning activities were published the other day, as were the costs of e-mails, texts and telephone calls. One has to ask how such spending will be monitored, as in some areas it is much more difficult to monitor than in others. Do we want to go down the road of having a political system that requires people to vote and to pay for parties—compulsory voting and compulsory paying? I do not believe that the public are ready for either of those things, which would discredit the body politic even more.

In conclusion, although a little more public funding may be appropriate—that is my party's position—I am open to the suggestions made by my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell and the Power report and mentioned by other Members that we should consider the five things on the list: matching funding to donations; tax relief playing a part; a cap on donations; local contributions to help local campaigning; and lastly, that the reward, if any, obtained from the state should be based not only on donations but on the share of the electoral vote, party membership or a combination of the three. I say simply that such things should be on the agenda. I am keen that we open that agenda this year and with urgency, because the system is not working at the moment.

12.10 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing this debate. There have been many thoughtful speeches about this issue on which I and others here have contributed for a number of years. My views are well known; indeed, I have put forward specific proposals—not quite my party's proposals—in previous debates.

As he wound up, the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) sounded as if he was reading the Conservative party's proposals. I could hardly spot an item of substantial difference, and that cheered me a lot. In a moment, we shall find out from the Minister whether there is tripartite agreement.

There has been near, although not quite full, agreement on six basic points. First, the electorate have a very unfortunate smell in their nostrils and something has to be done about that. We cannot carry on as we are. The electorate believe that money can buy power, access and influence in politics and that honours can be traded. Among other things, this corrodes the reputation of the House of Lords. The hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) said that the health of our polity was at stake and my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) talked about political disengagement.

The second point on which we agree is that all parties have contributed to that impression over the years. I am stumped on the apparent historic connection between the award of honours and business donations during the 1980s and 1990s. The Liberal Democrats are in deep treacle of their own—from a cursory glance, I think it the deepest of the lot, although I shall not go into detail. I shall not go through the litany on the Labour party either. We agree that we are all in the treacle to some degree.

The third thing on which we agree is that the steps taken so far have been insufficient and in some respects counter-productive. In this case, transparency has not been enough and, in some cases, the watchdog reports have fuelled press stories that have eroded further the credibility of politics and politicians. Sometimes that has been warranted, sometimes not.

With the collapse of the Lord Levy loans empire, there will be a return to a focus on the issue of union power and how, historically, unions have funded the Labour party. They are about to appoint the next Prime Minister and were involved in the Warwick agreement during the run-up to the last election; such issues will come back and become central to party political debate. All the steps taken so far, including attempts to moderate union influence over political parties—one party in particular—have failed.

The fourth thing on which we agree is that radical reform is needed to clean things up. The Conservative party has made a number of proposals, such as a cap on big donations, on which there is wide agreement. We can argue about what constitutes "big"; I have proposed between £1,000 and £5,000, while my party proposes an initial cap of £50,000. Such proposals should be the basis for discussion. My party's other proposals include a ban on loans and an end to all corporate, institutional and union financing. I agree with my party that there should be a reduction in the overall cost of politics; part of that might involve a cap on the amount spent in general elections.

There is also agreement on a fifth point: such proposals will leave the parties short of money—with much less money than now. There is near agreement that there should be some modest increase in state support. There is disagreement, or not full agreement, on how that can be delivered, and that issue should be discussed. A number of proposals, or menus of proposals, have been put forward today. One of the Conservative party's proposals is that there should be tax relief at the basic rate, and that has been proposed by the Neill Committee and the Electoral Commission too.

My party has also proposed a match funding scheme for non-taxpayers, an essential corollary if non-taxpayers are to be empowered, and additional funding on top. This could be related to votes cast or an extension of a match funding scheme—possibly a voucher scheme, as is proposed by the Power commission. My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) has put forward an interesting scheme to donate money through tax coding. All such suggestions, however they are dressed up, ultimately involve some form of extension of state support. The question is how best to put them together.

The sixth measure of broad agreement is that we have to break completely the link between honours and donations. That has not been much discussed this morning, but I know that the majority of Members here strongly support that.

Mr. Andrew Turner: In my hon. Friend's fifth point, he referred to the large measure of support for some additional taxpayer funding; I must say that I do not share in that support. Will he explain what is wrong with somebody giving £5 million to a fund administered, say, by the Electoral Commission, and the commission passing that on to a political party, or more than one, rather than people being forced to give money through taxes?

Mr. Tyrie: If that money were given to a governing party, the risk is that people would think policy might change once the party became aware of who gave it. None the less, there may be other ways, beyond those I have listed, of distancing donations from parties and Government—

Ann Winterton (in the Chair): Order. You have a charming back, Mr. Tyrie, but will you face the Chair now and again? I should like to see your face.

Mr. Tyrie: I shall do my best, Lady Winterton.

Matthew Taylor rose—

Mr. Tyrie: However, I have to look away from you occasionally.

Matthew Taylor: I could have intervened on my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) or on the Minister to make this point. Members here support another issue, although perhaps not universally. We should reform funding in a way that increases local activity rather than leads to the centralisation of the parties. That is my big concern about tying funding to past electoral performance. The more parties have to engage supporters and members to access whatever funds there are, the better they will be able to address the other side of this issue—the increase in the political activity of millionaires and the decrease in everybody else's.

Mr. Tyrie: I am grateful for that intervention.

I was going on to say that there are principles that everyone here appears to agree should lie behind any scheme. It just so happens that those five principles have been published by the Conservative party. First, the scheme should be fair and transparent; secondly, it should encourage local participation, which is essential; thirdly, it should be open to all voters, not only to taxpayers, to participate in; and fourthly, it should be voluntary for parties. The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell disagrees with me and the Conservative party on that. If a party decides not to take the cash, it should not be obliged to obey the rules. There should be freedom of access to the political system; we should not ossify it. The fifth principle is that the amount given should be proportionate to the task. We should spend the minimum required.

For the sake of clarity, I shall end by mentioning a couple of other points. First, the published proposals are Green Paper proposals, which form a package. The Conservative party will look sympathetically at anything else that is proposed or at a modification of those proposals. Secondly, I am confident that when the Conservative party wins the next election, its leader will act on them. There will be fundamental reform in this area.

I do not have time to go into the freedom argument as I know my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) would have liked to have done in some detail. It is an extremely important issue.

The ball is now firmly in the Government's court. The Conservatives have published their proposals and the Liberals' proposals have been out since 2000. The Labour party seems trapped in its union entanglements and is unable to provide us with its proposals. It has failed to respond to the Electoral Commission. Last week, the Lord Chancellor said that the Labour party would publish its proposals within a month. Will the Minister tell us whether that is correct? Will she assure us that they will be published? Will they address the key outstanding issue: the financial relationship between the unions and the Labour party?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): I shall try to rattle through things so as to respond to as many contributions as possible. Should I not manage to respond to points, I shall write to all hon. Members.

I endorse the comment made by the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) that this has been a good-tempered and sensible debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing it. Good-tempered and sensible as it is, it struck me yet again that there are almost as many opinions on the subject as there are Members of Parliament and, possibly, as there are Members of the other place and people in the media.

Nevertheless, one or two themes came through with some consistency. One was the idea of some kind of cap on national funding and an increase in state funding, albeit there are a variety of views about how that could be achieved. In addition, we would all welcome enthusiasm for more activity locally and an engagement with local communities and local members. Such activity has not been as lively as it might have been in recent years.

I also want to outline some of the things that have taken place and, in so doing, perhaps respond to the point raised by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) about the Electoral Commission report. The Government welcomed that report. Although I shall not be able to give him the full answer, any more than my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs was able to in November, perhaps I can move things on a little.

We have been in detailed internal discussions with the Electoral Commission, because it recognised within those discussions that further work needed to be done. Some of that has now been subsumed in the Hayden Phillips' review. That will not make the right hon.

[Bridget Prentice]

Gentleman too happy. The Electoral Commission will be working with Sir Hayden Phillips closely so that his review, which will come out at the end of the year, will be able to be progressed fairly quickly. In a sense, because we did not respond in the way that the right hon. Gentleman wanted within the past 18 months, things have now been overtaken by events. Whether that is a good thing is for him to reflect on. It will now be part of that review.

The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) mentioned the Labour party's views. I am not here today to speak on behalf of the Labour party because it would not be appropriate for me to do so. I can endorse what my noble Friend Lord Falconer said at the Constitutional Affairs Committee the other week. It is our understanding that the Labour party will publish its response by the end of the month. We all look forward to seeing it.

A comment was made about blind trusts administered by the Electoral Commission. The Committee on Standards in Public Life said some time ago that the problem is that their dominant feature is that the beneficiaries do not know who has contributed. That is obviously what blind trusts are about. However, it felt that that made them inappropriate because it moves away from the policy of transparency and openness that several hon. Members have tried to encourage.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) made a thoughtful contribution. He mentioned the Electoral Commission not having the involvement of politicians for a period of 10 years. The Committee on Standards in Public Life is reviewing the commission's work and that is an aspect of its work that will be examined closely. In defence of the commission, it has a group of great and good ex-Members of the House that advises it from time to time. We need to wait to hear what the Committee on Standards in Public Life has to say about whether that will be made into a formal process.

I want to make it clear that thriving political parties are an essential part of not just a functioning democracy but a vibrant one. I think we would all endorse that, although no one has said it so far. We should not be afraid to stand up and say that. Several factors affect the legitimacy of the party system. We must make it clear that political parties are an important part of our form of democracy and we need them if we are to have vibrancy in our democratic system.

The increasing reliance on big donors poses two risks: the appearance of the capture of a political party by that donor and the appearance of the irrelevance of individual members. The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell made that a central part of his contribution. We have moved quite far already, although much more needs to be done. We have put in place a transparent regime for the reporting of donations and have created the independent Electoral Commission. As I announced to the House on 20 March, we are now bringing forward amendments to the Electoral Administration Bill to introduce a regime to apply to loans, which will be similar to the donations system in respect of transparency and permissibility.

We are all responsible for the current situation. Speaking in the Grand Committee on that Bill, Lord Goodhart said:

> "In retrospect, we in the Committee on Standards in Public Life were, I fear, somewhat naive in not realising that loans, even if nominally at a commercial rate of interest, could be used to evade the rules of disclosure".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 23 March 2006; Vol. 680, c. GC 216.]

We all accept the position as we now find it.

I hope that we can use this debate as an opportunity to raise the questions that we need to ask Sir Hayden Phillips. There are difficult issues. We, as politicians and representatives of our parties, must continue to engage in them. I hope that we will use this debate as part of the contribution to his review. I look forward to further debates of this nature so that I, too, can hear the different views of Members about how we best move forward to sustain a vibrant and participatory democracy in this country.

Local Radio Franchise (Plymouth)

12.30 pm

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): Over the past two years, through a series of debates—about our university, our burgeoning health and marine science industries, our transport challenges and the urban renaissance in my constituency—I have been able to draw to the House's attention the progress of the city of Plymouth. My Conservative predecessor left a legacy of Plymouth having the poorest ward in England. We now have an urban vision developed by leading architect David Mackay, a planning framework to implement his vision, and the award of the Royal Town Planning Institute silver jubilee cup to the city council team that is bringing it on-stream—it beat the team that is bringing the Olympic village on-stream. We will soon be unveiling the economic strategy to match our ambitious aspirations for the built environment. Progress is evident all around us in Plymouth in the form of cranes on almost every horizon. Plymouth is a city on the move. Strong partnership work across the public, private and community sectors underpins its new-found confidence.

It was therefore unsurprising that when Ofcom announced that applications were invited for a licence to operate a new commercial radio station in Plymouth, there was a lot of interest from people in the area. That interest came from people with substantial roots in the community, and with proven track records of running businesses, particularly in the radio and media industry. David Rodgers, David Fitzgerald, Ian Calvert, Richard Bath, Louise Churchill, Elaine Elliott, Alan Qualtrough, Graham Gilbert, Angela Rippon and Hugh Scully, to name but a few, came forward in respect of four bids with local roots. As well as investing their own time and money over two years and undertaking four trial broadcasts, they took into account the views of more than 4,000 people living in Plymouth, dozens of Plymouth businesses and hundreds of listeners.

Unsurprisingly in the context of a city on the move, all that research pointed in the same general direction: a wish for there to be a radio station that is much more Plymouth-focused than any of the current stations, and for it to complement and reinforce the pride and confidence people have in the city. Therefore, there was consternation, disbelief, astonishment and downright anger when the bid went to an outsider, Diamond FM. Its proposals simply do not stack up in accordance with the climate of opinion in Plymouth as most people understand it.

In a straw poll of immediate reaction to the decision, the chamber of commerce notes responses such as "an absolute farce", "unbelievable", "bizarre" and "a cynical decision with enormous consequences".

Other responses included

"the most arrogant abuse of power by an unelected body",

"contempt", and

"the beginning of the end of British owned local radio".

For where else will British local business people collect together to invest in the region of £100,000—which is how much it takes to put a local bid together properly—if a foreign-owned bank can waltz in and do what amounts to little more than desk research over the space of a month to make a successful bid?

As the Minister and Ofcom have pointed out in replies to letters written by me and other furious people, there are four criteria to which Ofcom is required to have regard in awarding licences. They are set out in section 105 of the Broadcasting Act 1990. Let us consider each of them.

The first criterion is financial sustainability over the 12 years of the licence. It is extremely unlikely that the viability of any of the bids could have been questioned, given the substantial media shareholders who backed them. In questioning 20 advertisers, Diamond was unable to find a single one who would commit to advertising on the new radio station—hardly a ringing endorsement of its sustainability. So why did Ofcom award the licence to an applicant with financial projections which the regulator regarded as "ambitious"? Surely that can only mean that there is a strong probability that over time the quality of the programme service on offer will be downgraded so that the company stays profitable. From what people tell me about the way Macquarie Bank Ltd operates, it is hardly likely to sustain a loss leader.

Criterion (b) is how far the proposals cater for the tastes and interests of people living in the area that the licence covers, or any particular tastes and interests where that is the basis of the proposal. Ofcom refers to Diamond's proposal as likely to be "relatively popular"—which, again, is hardly a ringing endorsement. The bid is rock-based, and experience elsewhere in the UK is that rock is a notoriously difficult format with which to achieve acceptable audience levels. It also has a strong male bias, and I note that the Radio Licensing Committee considering the licence comprised of one woman among its seven members. That is unacceptable.

The research of the other four applicants produced overwhelming evidence that pointed in the same direction. Why was it ignored? Why, at a time when Plymouth has such bold ambitions, was Diamond allowed to make a virtue out of not consulting people who are leading the renaissance? On page 52 of its application, Diamond states:

"we have spent no time procuring letters of support from business, civic and community leaders".

Apart from Diamond's very thin local research and its making no reference to the key elements of the city's progress that I have mentioned, it wrongly quotes the name of the local paper and refers to "the Plymouth Sound", which no one who is local would ever do. Surely it could have involved at least one local person who would have spotted that. Indeed, we have yet to come across any evidence that before being granted the licence it visited the city at all, except through employing market researchers. No trial service was conducted to see whether Plymothians liked what it was offering.

Criterion (c) is the extent to which any proposed service would broaden the range of programmes available by way of local services, and cater for tastes and interests different from those already catered for. Diamond's application estimates that a locally provided rock-based station would cater for a taste not currently provided for. I will comment further on that claim in a moment.

Ofcom refers to

"Diamond's comprehensive local news proposals".

[Linda Gilroy]

At three minutes long per bulletin, they are certainly an improvement on those of the existing radio stations, which offer minimal local focus. Weekday news bulletins from 6.30 am to 6 pm are short—usually two minutes long—and are biased towards national and international stories. Provision of local information is minimal. However, Diamond's proposal is hardly in line with the aspirations that the more broadly based research of the other applicants demonstrated. What Plymouth really wants is much more local focus than that offered by the existing operators—97FM Plymouth Sound, Classic Gold Digital and Pirate FM.

Criterion (d) is the extent to which there is evidence of demand or support for the provision of the proposed service from people living in the area. Rock-based formats always prove challenging in the UK. After nine years, Xfm still achieves only a 1.5 per cent. audience share in London. Virgin AM nationally achieves only 1.6 per cent. and in London, where it is on FM, it achieves only a 3 per cent. share. Kerrang! in the west midlands has a 3 per cent. share.

Audience research suggested that those who wanted such a format also wanted minimal speech interruption of the music. Streaming and iPods increasingly make that possible, and will make achieving audience share with rock even more difficult. Rock music is readily available from at least three other services: Virgin AM, Planet Rock and Xfm on digital—the future of radio, perhaps. However, Diamond expects to achieve a 7.5 per cent. audience share in its first year, rising to 10.7 per cent. in year three.

The four Diamond applications were clones of each other, the common format being classic rock. Was Diamond ever going to bother about local support or be responsive to local need? How can a genuine verdict be expected before the evidence has been examined? The sample of Plymouth opinion taken by Diamond was derisory. Its licence application states that it spoke to 452 people, and 128 stated a preference for a classic rock station—a minority of a tiny sample. So Ofcom has decided that a city with a population of between 200,000 and 300,000 people will, for at least 12 years, be landed with a radio station based on the preferences of 128 of its citizens.

What my constituents say is lacking in Plymouth is a quality local news and information service—a radio station for Plymouth. Can Ofcom really say that its award of the licence satisfies the need for comprehensive local news, let alone for a fully fledged station with broad local content? Diamond has tried to recognise that by talking up that aspect of its bid in a way that allows Ofcom to tick the box, but Diamond's provision will represent only marginally more than current providers, and in a way that is wholly unlikely to meet the aspirations revealed by other applicants' research. What a lamentable waste of precious airspace at this crucial juncture in Plymouth's future.

All in all, Diamond seems to have a very tenuous claim to meet any of the four criteria. The statement Ofcom issued some weeks after the award of the licence outlining its reasoning stated,

"given the characteristics of the area, it felt unable to indicate whether any one of the four statutory licensing criteria . . . would be likely to be regarded as of particular significance. However, it was stated that, in respect of criterion (d)—the extent to which there is evidence of local demand or support for a proposed service, Ofcom would be likely to attach greater weight to robust and meaningful evidence of demand as demonstrated by findings from research undertaken in the licence area and, if appropriate, detailed analysis of the existing market, than to evidence of local support as demonstrated by letters from potential listeners and/or advertisers."

Why? Had it already made up its mind that it needed to create the conditions for a formulaic, cloned approach, such as Diamond's? Diamond's bid bears a close resemblance to unsuccessful Macquarie-backed bids by Radio UK Holdings Ltd. in Swansea, the north-east and Southend. It seems clear that Ofcom was tilting the playing field to allow Macquarie bank to take its place as one of the foreign-owned UK radio operators permitted by the Communications Act 2003. What on earth else could account for its being awarded the Plymouth licence when its application was so lacking in quality? Plymothians deserve better than that.

Diamond has no directors or senior managers with any knowledge of Plymouth that we are aware of. Tim Schoonmaker is listed as non-executive chairman. He is an American who certainly has great experience in UK radio from working with Emap, but he has recently joined Credit Suisse bank. Despite public reassurances that he will remain in post, it seems unlikely that he can do so for long, as he will be working for one of Macquarie's competitors. We now understand that Shaun Gregory, former managing director of Emap, is to become chief executive of UK Radio Holdings Ltd. We still have no idea who will manage the Plymouth radio station.

By way of contrast, three other applicants—Drake FM, Plymouth Live and Radio Plymouth—are local groups, and there is abundant evidence of their seeking opinions, trialling programme services and gaining support for their plans. All three easily demonstrate the financial resources necessary to sustain a 12-year local radio licence.

The Minister has responsibility for creative industries as well as broadcasting. I hope that he will take particular note of the recent letter that I received from Mark Hawkins on behalf of Plymouth Media Partnership, a cluster of just under 600 people involved in media and new media in the city that is set to become one of the five or six key clusters at the heart of the economic strategy that I mentioned earlier. He wrote to me as follows:

"We would like to make you aware of the astonishment and anger within the Plymouth media community at the recently announced decision by Ofcom to award a new local radio licence for the City to a company owned by an Australian Bank . . . The shock at this decision has not only been felt in Plymouth but also further afield. As one senior media executive told me 'It is a real slap in the face for an industry that has been identified as having huge potential for economic growth in the region. It is a disgrace that one of the locally owned bids did not succeed and enable the indigenous industry to grow' . . . Of equal concern is the complete disregard for the views of the people of Plymouth".

Pointing out that the Diamond application showed a minority of respondents expressing an interest in the format, he said:

"The substantial combined research of the other groups indicated an entirely different need."

That comes from a body that is in touch with the pulse of Plymouth in a way that no other group can claim to be with quite the same credibility. The Minister has responsibility for industries that are especially important in our region. We need to have confidence in his ability to consider what is happening in Plymouth in a joined-up way.

Perversely, Ofcom's decision can only result in a sub-optimal outcome for extending choice, providing diversity for local audiences and encouraging our indigenous small and medium-sized enterprises in the media sector. That cannot be right. If the Minister believes that my arguments do not add up to enough reason to take a closer look at what is going on under the current legislation and guidance, I invite him to tell me how and when we can revisit the criteria that led to such a perverse outcome.

Local radio should mean what it says on the tin, and I can certainly say that hell hath no fury like Plymothians who feel that they are being conned. Ofcom could scarcely have picked a less appropriate community on which to inflict a decision to grant a foreign, top-down media interest a licence for a local radio station. No city has a greater sense of new localism. If Macquarie sees the writing on the wall saying that its top-down bid is not welcome in Plymouth, perhaps the Minister can insist that it tells us sooner rather than later, and lets us have the licence back so that we can have a genuine local contest. Can he tell us whether the period that Macquarie has been allowed for developing the bid can be foreshortened? Why is it being allowed two years at this critical time in our city's history? The other bids would have been up and running much earlier. If the Minister can answer none of the above, perhaps he will consider asking Ofcom to look into whether, given the exceptional circumstances that I have described, there could be a further licence for Plymouth.

I am sure that the anger and frustration that I am channelling into Westminster from Plymouth is palpable, and it is probably only fair to signal to the Minister that we will look for further ways to raise the issues that I have outlined—after we have considered his response, of course.

12.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): It is a pleasure to speak under your chairmanship, Lady Winterton. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) on securing the debate. She has made an extremely powerful case, and I am sure that what she says was listened to with interest, both here and outside this Chamber.

This is an important issue for Plymouth, and I know that there are real concerns about the subject locally. My hon. Friend has been tireless in raising it, and in campaigning, not just on that issue but on the general importance of the economic regeneration of Plymouth. She has been discussing the issue before us with Ministers ever since the decision first came to light, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck).

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton is a constant advocate of the economic regeneration of Plymouth. She is absolutely right to showcase the importance of the creative industries to that regeneration. In fact, on 14 December she brought a delegation from Plymouth to the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to discuss the future of local television. We discussed how local television could act as a learning slope for students who want to get into the media, as well as the importance of the role that local media can play in acting as a catalyst for the development of the creative industries in Plymouth and in the south-west generally. The delegation's central point was that the media and the creative industries will be at the heart of the economic future.

I have been lucky enough to visit the south-west regularly since becoming Minister with responsibility for creative industries, and I know that my hon. Friend's view about the importance of those industries is widely shared across the region, but in particular by Juliet Williams, the chair of the South West of England Development Agency. She has been centrally involved in my Department's creative economy programme. That regional development agency is actively looking to support the emerging creative industries in the south-west.

Of course, the media are not just of economic importance; they are also culturally and democratically significant. They help to shape our local and regional identities, and it is in the media that we have debates about the future of our cities, towns and regions. That is the second reason why the issue of a licence has been of such interest in Plymouth.

In the brief time available to me I should like to explain how the decision was taken, reassure my hon. Friend about some of the local content issues—if I can—and perhaps explain what more can be done if she is not satisfied. The first and overwhelming point to recognise is that licensing is a matter for Ofcom, which takes its decisions independently of Government. That is quite proper; that is the view shared by all parties in the House of Commons. It is not for me to justify or defend Ofcom's decisions. That is a matter for Ofcom, and it is quite able to do that itself. However, it is worth thinking through what the consequences would be if politicians were able to double-guess Ofcom's decisions.

It is right that decisions be taken by experts, based on the evidence, because otherwise politicians would clearly have a conflict of interest in choosing radio stations that could cover politicians' activities. To understand that, one need only do a thought experiment about a licence being won by a group chaired by a member of a political party, or someone who had been involved with a political party. If the Government of the day decided to double-guess the decision taken by Ofcom, it would lead to widespread public concern. That is why the decisions are taken by Ofcom. Before Ofcom, they were taken by the Radio Authority. It is right that those decisions be independent, and Ofcom should be able to take them without feeling that Ministers are standing behind it, ready to intervene.

Radio spectrum is scarce, so only a limited number of services can be made available in any one area. As my hon. Friend said, the Communications Act 2003 gives Ofcom a general duty to ensure the availability of a wide range of radio services throughout the UK. When taken as a whole, those services should be of a high quality and calculated to appeal to a variety of tastes and interests.

[James Purnell]

The Broadcasting Act 1990 requires Ofcom to take into account several factors in awarding a radio licence, and my hon. Friend went through them. They include the applicant's ability to maintain the service, the extent to which the service caters for the tastes and interests of people living in the area and broadens the range of programmes available, and the evidence of demand or support for the proposed service. Those criteria are designed to ensure a fair and transparent evaluation mechanism for applicants. They also ensure a choice of high-quality radio services for listeners throughout the period of the licence.

My hon. Friend was clearly concerned about localness. The Communications Act recognised the importance of the local content and character of commercial radio services. Consequently, it gave Ofcom a new duty to secure, where appropriate, that services should include programmes containing local material and that a suitable proportion of programmes should be locally made. The Act defines local material as material that is of particular interest to persons or communities living or working in an area.

The localness regime does not and was not intended to dictate that licence owners should be locally based. In practice, however, Ofcom requires that stations be located in the licensed area and that the service produces at least some locally made programming. Ofcom has said that it is not appropriate to prescribe in advance a specific amount of local or locally made programming for the purposes of licensing. Rather, it is for applicants to consider what is appropriate and to construct their applications accordingly. Once proposals on local context have been made, however, they become a mandatory part of the service. A local content guarantee is therefore built into the licences.

Ofcom set out in detail how those criteria were applied to the Plymouth licence award, and my hon. Friend commented on them in detail. I shall not comment on the merits of Ofcom's decision, although the regulator noted that the winning bid contained more hourly local news than bids from other applicants. Anybody listening to the debate will be clear, however, that my hon. Friend disagrees with Ofcom's decision.

My hon. Friend asked specifically about the two-year period in which the service is to be up and running. I understand that that is a maximum and that the service will be up and running within nine months.

My hon. Friend's comments also concentrated on local ownership and local representation. The foreign ownership of broadcasting services is not a new concept in the UK, and it has been possible for non-UK residents to own radio licences since the Broadcasting Act 1990. The Act allowed anyone from any member of the European economic area to own a broadcast licence, and anyone from beyond the EEA to hold cable and satellite licences. The Communications Act went one step further by removing foreign ownership restrictions on all broadcasting licences. There is nothing in legislation, therefore, to prevent a foreign company from owning a licence.

In the case of Plymouth, Ofcom stated that the applicant would be the fifth local commercial broadcaster in the area and that the ownership of the licence by a wholly owned subsidiary of Macquarie bank would place Diamond in a strong position

"to establish a secure financial base" and mean that it would "have access to significant resources".

That is the case that Ofcom made, although, as I said, my hon. Friend has doubts about it. I am sure, however, that she will continue to raise the issue with Ofcom.

To say the least, my hon. Friend has made a powerful case in explaining why Ofcom's decision has not been warmly greeted by all sections of the Plymouth community, but I hope that she will understand why I cannot pretend to be able to overturn that decision. As I said, there is no facility for ministerial double-guessing of Ofcom's decision, but my hon. Friend clearly believes that there are further issues to consider. She will therefore need to discuss those with Ofcom and, indeed, she is already doing so. I hope that she will also look at the local content guarantee and that she will be reassured that there are facilities and processes to enable us to consider any worries that might emerge about local content as the service develops.

My hon. Friend mentioned her concern that those local content guarantees might be diluted if the service were not financially viable. She might be interested to know, however, that anyone who believes that a licence holder is failing to comply with the terms of their licence or format can complain to Ofcom. In some cases, that could lead to fines or even the loss of the licence. Moreover, Ofcom itself will conduct regular sampling of stations to ensure that they comply with their formats.

Linda Gilroy: I am listening carefully to my hon. Friend's response and I suspect that he will tell me that there is the possibility of judicial review if we are totally unsatisfied with the way in which Ofcom has gone about its job. However, I am concerned that we have got the whole framework wrong and I hope that my hon. Friend will cover what I said about local radio meaning what it says on the tin. What opportunities do we have to revisit the question of whether we have got the framework right?

James Purnell: If my hon. Friend wanted to revisit the framework, and people decided that that was necessary, we would obviously need to revise the Communications Act. She knows how long that would take, and although I do not want to dismiss that possibility, it would not make any difference to this particular licence award. The Act has been on the statute book for less than three years, and there is no appetite for revising it at this stage. As I said, the prime route for raising concerns about the licence is Ofcom, which makes the relevant decisions.

Although local radio and licence applications have been a real concern locally, they are not the end of the story in terms of media in Plymouth. One area of potential interest that my hon. Friend might want to consider is community radio. Community radio stations are run and generally owned by the local community and address exactly the issues that she described. They provide the opportunity for local coverage and debate and are typically run by local residents and community groups. Some people see them as providing exactly the kind of service that my hon. Friend thinks her constituency needs.

Linda Gilroy: I am reluctant to intervene, because we are reaching the closing stages. However, Plymouth is the 15th largest city in the country, and we aspire to be among the top 10. We want fair treatment under the arrangements for allocating commercial radio licences.

James Purnell: I understand what my hon. Friend is saying, but I am seeking to explain that if she is unsuccessful in achieving a material decision on the award of the licence, there are further routes, beyond looking at the licence application. Some people would say that the movement towards community radio is significant and is not to be dismissed. It could help to address some of the concerns that she raised, and she might like to work with local community groups to explore that possibility. Indeed, the Community Media Association can help groups interested in developing local stations, and I encourage her to discuss the opportunities with it.

Beyond local radio, there is the possibility of local television, as I discussed with my hon. Friend's constituents when we met. That could involve satellite, the internet or, potentially, digital-terrestrial. I hope that those suggestions are helpful—

Tax Credit Overpayments (Edinburgh)

1 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): I am delighted to have secured this debate at what is an opportune moment, with the latest report from the Public Accounts Committee hot off the press and the latest figures for overpayments due for publication in the coming weeks. Now is an ideal time to reflect on the current state of the tax credit system and the scale of the problem. I am also delighted to see the Paymaster General in her place. She has met me and other hon. Members to discuss the issue, and I appreciate the seriousness both with which she takes the suggestions that are put to her and with which her office has done its work.

Hardly a week goes by without a constituent turning up at my advice surgery having experienced problems with tax credits. Later I shall highlight just three such cases, but there are many more in my constituency and the rest of the city. Each case has caused financial hardship for the individual or family concerned, many of whom live on a tight budget and who have given the tax credit office the correct information and on time.

Central to my remarks is my view that if a constituent has supplied all the information requested on time and informed the tax credit office of any changes of circumstance, it is reasonable for them to assume that the calculation by the department would be correct. The cases that I intend to highlight are examples of where all information had been given and yet the tax credit office still insisted on repayment. That injustice must not be allowed to continue.

I am sure that many hon. Members agreed with last week's report of the Public Accounts Committee, which condemned as deplorable the fact that thousands of already hard-pressed families will have to pay back money because of Revenue mistakes. We are talking about almost £1.9 million in overpayments and £700,000 in underpayments, out of £5.7 million in awards. That is an enormous problem rate, especially when it comes to clawing back overpayments and paying out underpayments.

The situation in Edinburgh broadly reflects the national picture. The latest figures show that almost 30,000 people across Edinburgh are in receipt of tax credits. The figures for 2003–04 show that almost 32 per cent. of tax credit awards in Edinburgh were overpaid. That left 9,800 families in the city being forced to repay an average of £1,020 each. It is no secret that a similar level of overpayments for 2004–05 is widely anticipated. It is for that reason that today's debate is so important.

I would not suggest that the tax credit system has not made an important contribution, either in providing work incentives or in reducing poverty, but this debate is about the thousands of people across Edinburgh, some in real poverty, whose situation is being made much worse by a systemic failure that the Government must address. The adopted system of annual assessment was inevitably going to lead to some overpayment and underpayment of tax credits, but it is now clear that the Government grossly underestimated the scale on which the problem would occur. I am sure that hon. Members are familiar with the figures, but it is worth reminding ourselves of the sheer size of the error.

[John Barrett]

In 2003–04, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs paid out around £15.8 billion in child and working tax credits to 5 million families, and paid out a similar amount in the following year. In each year, around £2.2 billion was overpaid to about 1.9 million families. That was more than double the amount expected when the system was initially set up. Government oversight on such a scale has contributed to the current inability of the system to cope with the magnitude of the problem that we now face.

Without doubt, part of the problem can be traced to the complexity of the system. Often it seems so obscure that it can baffle even the experts. Far too often no explanation is given for an overpayment and the chance of getting through to someone on the helpline has, for many, seemed nigh-on impossible. Figures show that there have been millions of unanswered calls to Government helplines. That must be addressed.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I do not diminish at all the points that the hon. Gentleman wishes to make about his constituents, but I remind him that figures that he quoted on difficulties getting through to the helpline are from 2003—the first few months of the tax credit computer. We have never disputed the fact that there were problems, but the helpline has improved considerably. Most people get through on the day and I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman acknowledged that.

John Barrett: I am certainly glad to acknowledge that. I am delighted when access to a helpline is improved, not only for hon. Members but for our constituents. I take the point that the Paymaster General makes and welcome all improvements.

While the complexity of the system is undoubtedly leading to a high incidence of error, there is also a danger that vulnerable claimants, such as elderly pensioners, could be put off from taking up benefits by what they perceive as a wall of complicated forms and impenetrable jargon. Newspaper headlines revealing massive benefit clawbacks are hardly the best encouragement for those thinking of applying. I look forward to hearing the Paymaster General's comments on that.

I should like to qualify my remarks. I do not suggest that the Government are responsible for every overpayment or underpayment in the system. I entirely agree that, if an individual fails to inform Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs of changes in circumstance or has made an attempt to hide or embellish information, it is only right that the Government should reclaim any amount overpaid. However, in too many instances mistakes have been caused by official error. It is in that context that the Government have acted entirely improperly and in which I look forward to hearing the Paymaster General's views.

If constituents of mine have been open and honest in their dealings with the tax credit office and yet internal mistakes have led to an overpayment, it is unacceptable to demand large amounts of money back from people who reasonably assumed that the Government would get their sums right. It is nothing short of outrageous that decent, honest, hard-working people are forced into financial hardship as a direct result of incompetence in the system. Such people are not premiership footballers who can have a few weeks' wages deducted with no adverse effects. Many tax credit recipients budget from week to week and cannot afford to have their payments halted or to pay back large sums of money that have already been spent. I appreciate that the Government have made some progress in that regard, making provisions, I understand, to write off debts worth around £1 billion for those who would suffer extreme hardship as a result. Nevertheless, they have an obligation to do more. I should like them to take a leaf out of the Australian book by admitting to their mistakes, wiping the slate clean and writing off all overpayment debts resulting from official error.

The effect of the Government's policy is that a constituent of mine who has been overpaid through no fault of their own and entirely through the incompetence of the Revenue will have that money reclaimed by the Government. That constituent will then have to try to stop the reclaim. One example is Mrs. Pauline Duff, who contacted me a while ago. She and her new partner moved house from one part of my constituency to the South Gyle area. The tax credit office reassessed the claim and the new amount was half of what it was before. The new assessment was sent to Mrs. Duff at her new address and included her new partner's full details.

In 2005, the tax credit office advised that an overpayment had been made because Mrs. Duff had failed to give details of her change in circumstances. The office claimed that she had failed to inform it of her new address and of the fact that she was living with her partner. However, the letter was sent to her new address and contained all the details of her partner, so that explanation did not stand up to scrutiny. A small payment of £85 in compensation has been made to Mrs. Duff for errors and delays on the part of the Tax Credit Office, but it is insisting on reclaiming from her overpayments of £4,517, which she cannot afford. That is entirely wrong and unfair.

The second example is of Mr. Terence Dwyer, who became unemployed in 2003. Later that year he was successful in getting a part-time job, and then moved to a full-time job. His partner, who was then a housewife, started work as a home help for Edinburgh city council, where she remains today. They informed the tax credit office of her rate of pay, number of hours and relevant details, as well as of his rate of pay, working hours and relevant details. The tax credit office later advised that owing to a computer glitch it had assessed the claim on the wrong figures of joint income, despite Mr. Dwyer giving all the correct information. The glitch meant an overpayment to Mr. Dwyer of £1,423. He has asked the tax credit office for a breakdown of the calculations, but none was forthcoming. The office has stated in no uncertain terms that it will require all the money back. It is that fundamental unreasonableness at the heart of the system that is causing so many problems.

A third case is that of Mrs. Mowat, a widow with four children. In July 2004, the tax credit office advised her that her award was £2,249. She had previously written to advise it that her second youngest child had just left school. In late 2004, she received a second notice to say that for the same period the amount that she was entitled to would be reduced to £1,585. She made numerous telephone calls to the tax credit office and was finally promised that the system would be rectified to show the correct date of the child's leaving school. She received an award notice in 2005, which said that she had been underpaid tax credits. In November 2005, she received the form "Request to reconsider recovery of tax credits", which she filled out and returned in December 2005. No reply has yet been received.

Those are three cases of people providing the details and being absolutely honest, submitting all their changes of circumstances on time. The Government form TC846 states clearly that if the Revenue has "paid too much tax credit as a result of a mistake we have made and it was reasonable for you to believe we were paying you the correct amount, we will not ask you to pay back the amount overpaid."

The use of the term "reasonable" is the crux of the problem. When constituents such as Mrs. Duff and Mr. Dwyer bring a case to me, they do not think that it is reasonable that they should be expected to be able to work out something on a form that they barely understood. I do not believe that the responsibility to check and correct the Revenue's mistakes should rest with my constituents. A constituent such as Mrs. Mowat, who is claiming child tax credit, should be devoting her time to helping her children with homework, not checking and correcting the mistakes of Revenue officials.

In his last Budget, the Chancellor—who introduced the tax credit schemes—raised the threshold for changes in income that could be disregarded when provisional payments were reassessed from £2,500 to £25,000 in order to improve the situation. I understand that the increase has been made to cut the number of claimants whose entitlements will change when they are annually recalculated. Although the Government believe that the changes could reduce the level of overpayments by as much as a third, nevertheless they do not deal with the unfairness at the heart of the system that I have just documented. What is needed is a fundamental rethink of the benefits system and a move towards a fairer system of fixed awards and clearer award notices.

I have been slightly amused by the way in which the Chancellor has managed to distance himself from recent difficulties in his party, watching troubles unfold from afar in Africa, but he will find it altogether more difficult to avoid the continuing chaos in the tax credit system. Lest we forget his words at the launch of the system, I repeat that he promised that it would help those on the lowest incomes. For a system designed to improve the lot of the worst off, it has been far from an unqualified success. Rarely has tough love been so tough. As my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) has said, the Chancellor should not be allowed to escape responsibility for the social and economic costs of the flawed policy. I am sure that the Paymaster General is aware of some of the comments my hon. Friend has made.

Although teething problems are inevitable for any new system, the people of Edinburgh are entitled to expect more in the way of improvements to the system. In the words of the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, we find ourselves with a system that has become "increasingly arcane, unwieldy and baffling both to benefit staff and customers."

I concede that steps have been taken to improve aspects of the problem, such as removing anomalies from housing benefit, but as the Committee put it the improvements have been "rather piecemeal developments" and the lack of objective ways of measuring complexity in the system means that it is difficult to see whether they have had any major effect.

With a Government obsessed by means-testing and targets, it is clear that too many people are being failed by the system. When the Government talk about helping those on the lowest incomes, it is worth remembering that the gap between rich and poor has widened since 1997, with the percentage of the tax burden on the poorest still heavier than that on the best off. If the tax credit system was supposed to reverse that shameful record, it has a long way to go.

Many of my constituents are rightly impatient. They are suffering under the present system and are asking for what the Government have promised in statements. They will accept nothing less.

1.15 pm

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) on securing the debate today at short notice. He raises some important issues. I will deal first with the matters of policy, and say why I could not disagree more with the hon. Gentleman's assessment, and pick up on some of the points about his being inundated. I am not sure where the casework is, if it is not with me. I will then deal with the three cases that he raised, those of Mrs. Duff, Mr. Dwyer and Mrs. Mowat.

First, I remind the hon. Gentleman that the debate, as he rightly says, is in connection with families in Edinburgh who receive tax credits that, with child benefit, deliver financial support to the vast majority of families with children in the UK. They play a vital role in tackling child poverty and helping make work pay.

The hon. Gentleman repeated today, as his party often does, that the gap between rich and poor is becoming greater. That is because they choose to ignore the impact of tax credits. It is convenient to miss out information that does not fit the argument that one would want to advance.

Tax credits provide more than £15 billion support to nearly 20 million people. They play a major role in moving people into work and aid mobility of labour, helping men and women to move up the employment ladder, thus achieving one of the Government's aims of greater employment flexibility. That has happened in Edinburgh as it has in many towns and cities across the country. The policies, combined with economic stability, have helped to increase the number of people in work by 2.3 million. Like the US earned income tax credit, tax credits help people off benefits and into work. When people move into work the flexible tax credit system corresponds to their changes in circumstance. More and more research is coming out that demonstrates that the flexible system of tax credits is infinitely better than a fixed system that is unfair, limited and unjust in that it does not fulfil any of those objectives.

Let us consider the question of fairness, which the hon. Gentleman touched on. As I have said, the real test of fairness is that tax credits tackle family poverty. They have done that, lifting 700,000 children out of relative poverty since 1997 and more than 1.5 million out of absolute poverty, many in his constituency and mine. Tax credits are designed to be inclusive and not to stigmatise people. The hon. Gentleman may remember that the system for those out of work was entirely different from that which applied for those in work; people carried a stigma and had terrible problems in moving from unemployment into paid employment. That has been removed through the tax credits system. It is a progressive universalism; the credits help every family, but some families receive considerably more help, which is important if we are to tackle poverty.

Tax credits introduced a fundamental change to the welfare state. It is an income-related system; in effect, it is a negative tax. However, the hon. Gentleman and his party never take that point on board, nor do they include it in their calculations. The system supports 6 million families and 10 million children, with 360,000 families being helped with child care costs who were never helped under the old system. That compares favourably with the fact that only 800,000 families received family credit. Put another way, more than 19 million people benefit from tax credits. That is seven times the number who received family credit, or nearly one in three of all people.

The hon. Gentleman said that the system puts people off. Let us consider the take-up figures. I do not dispute that there were computer problems in the early months of 2003–04, the scheme's first year; the problems were huge, but I have repeatedly been frank to the House about them. Despite those problems, however, tax credits were at a record level, with take-up at 80 per cent. in the first year of operation. That vastly outstripped family credit, which barely reached the upper 60s in its last year of operation.

For low-income families, the group mentioned by the hon. Gentleman as being unfairly treated, the take-up rate was about 90 per cent., which is higher than any previous income-related system of support for families with children. The figures demonstrate that take-up is not being undermined by the same problems that we saw in the first year. The reverse is true; take-up is rising steadily. That does not show a system in crisis, as the hon. Gentleman asserts; nor is it in chaos.

It is a system to which people are committed and of which they have an understanding, and they know how it benefits them. How did all those people apply if the system was so difficult? The truth is that the questions are straightforward: How many children are there? How much do they earn? Do their partners earn? There are other related questions on child care, and they are asked where they live and whether they will notify us of any change in circumstance. It would be difficult to make it more straightforward and responsive.

We are discussing a typical constituency—the hon. Gentleman's or mine. We are discussing a family with two children on half the average earnings; in today's climate, they would be receiving £4,200 a year more as a result of the tax credits. Indeed, the very poorest can now receive up to £107 a week, compared with £20 in 1997. It is breathtaking that the hon. Gentleman should assert that those families are worse off and that they do not get what they should from the system.

Evidence continues to show that money is going to those families. The evidence is not the Department's, but an independent assessment of the system, and it shows that the money is benefiting the children. As the poorest have seen their incomes rise, they have increased their expenditure on children's clothes and on fruit and vegetables faster than average family spending. That is crucially important; it goes to the heart of the points raised by the hon. Gentleman.

John Barrett: I appreciate much of what the Minister says, but at the heart of the issue is the fact that although constituents have given details accurately and on time, miscalculations have been made. Before she deals with the details of my constituents' cases, I should point out that a number of people have told me of similar cases. For instance, one young constituent told me this weekend that she is having to pay back £900 as a result of a miscalculation; she just accepts that it has to be repaid. Not everyone who has been overpaid and who is having the money clawed back has come to me. However, I have much anecdotal evidence that many people who have suffered such miscalculations are not pursuing the case. They simply accept it.

Dawn Primarolo: I was about to deal with the hon. Gentleman's constituency cases, but he questioned take-up of tax credits, he questioned whether the system was helping the poor and he went on about helping those most in need. I felt that I had to respond. I could not leave those assertions on the table and unchallenged. I hope that he appreciates that.

I turn now to the cases raised by the hon. Gentleman, and the anecdotal evidence that he mentioned. I do not see how Governments can plan in response to anecdotal evidence. We have to work on real evidence. He wrote 23 letters to the tax credit office within a year, many of them on the same case. He has written to me on five occasions, and he has telephoned the MPs' hotline 11 times. I know that each of those cases is important and that they need to be dealt with. However, given that there are something like 6,000 families in his constituency in receipt of tax credits, the hon. Gentleman must accept that that does not fit the definition of chaos. To supplement that with anecdotal evidence makes it impossible. I might as well have a crystal ball to help me define policy.

I turn to the cases raised by the hon. Gentleman. He is right about the current policy on overpayment, which people accept. When an overpayment occurs as a result of an official error and it is unreasonable to expect the claimant to have noticed the error—that is, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs did something with the information on the form that the claimant could not possibly have known about and the claimant attempted to inform HMRC—it has been clearly and repeatedly stated in the House that the reasonableness test and the official error combined will be applied. As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, if there is real hardship the Department has the discretion to write off the overpayment, to slow down repayments or to supplement income to the family in order to avoid it.

Each of the three cases that the hon. Gentleman cited arose in 2003–04, which I have already acknowledged was a difficult year, and from the information that he gave it is impossible for me to respond on the spot.

However, I have some familiarity with the case of Miss Duff, because the hon. Gentleman has written to me about it—he is still awaiting a reply, and I hope to write to him soon—and he has asked a parliamentary question. In the Miss Duff case, I have every sympathy. I have seen HMRC's explanation—there are many points in its favour, such as misunderstandings of what Miss Duff did or did not tell it—but the time lapse needs to be taken into account. I hope to write to the hon. Gentleman within the next few days to confirm that Miss Duff should not be asked to repay her tax credits, as it is not her fault that she was overpaid. I need time to consider the other two cases. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me that.

In conclusion, I am always happy to meet or correspond with any Member of the House, and if there is an injustice in the system I will certainly sort it out. However, I will not give an inch to anyone somehow inferring from one mistake—

Ann Winterton (in the Chair): Order.

Social Behaviour Teaching

1.30 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Raising the issue of the teaching of social behaviour in primary schools is simply the most important thing that I can do as a Back-Bench MP for the future of my constituency. In November, I became chair of the local strategic partnership in Nottingham, which we have revived and relaunched as One Nottingham. Its mission is to tackle deprivation and inequality not by running after symptoms, but by prevention and early intervention. One Nottingham has three emblematic policies: to create a city strategy to bring people on incapacity benefit back into work; to co-ordinate activity on the 50 most difficult families in Nottingham; and, most importantly, to teach social behaviour to every primary school child in our city. We continue to develop that work and offer neighbourhood renewal funding in co-ordination with our partners, especially the local education authority, and with full support from Ministers responsible for schools, for which I am most grateful.

Why teach social behaviour in primary schools? Our white, working-class, outer-city former council estates are beset by the symptoms of educational failure, including petty criminality, antisocial behaviour, teenage pregnancy, low aspirations and low academic attainment. Eleven per cent. of kids going to secondary school cannot read the first lesson. We send fewer kids to university than any other constituency in the UK. All those symptoms can be tracked back to the inability to learn effectively because of poor social, emotional and communication skills. The teaching of social behaviour is designed to give youngsters at primary school the essential skills that we all take for granted, but in my constituency are not always taught by parents.

Ofsted inspection after Ofsted inspection reports that, despite high standards of teaching, leadership and environment in local primary schools, youngsters do not attain acceptable standards. The reports go on to state that many of those children arrive at school unable to complete a sentence and to recognise a letter or a number. In those circumstances, it is essential that the children are given the social toolkit to be able to learn, rather than being squeezed into a middle-England academic model, which dooms them at the age of five to a lifetime of failure. The Government are now helping us to address the causes of the problems, rather than the symptoms, which is most welcome. To drive ever harder on the consequences—be they child abuse or young people not obtaining five A to C grade GCSEs—without addressing the causes is no longer a sustainable or long-term strategy.

What is social behaviour? Essentially, learning social behaviour involves learning the skills necessary to progress at school and the ability to resolve arguments without violence, to empathise with classmates and to develop self-respect and mutual respect. It includes responsibility for and ownership of behaviour. Children need to understand that their actions have consequences for themselves and others. They need to learn techniques for solving day-to-day problems, particularly alternative courses of action to deal with provocative situations.

[Mr. Graham Allen]

Social behaviour means children valuing themselves and their achievements. Poor self-esteem is at the root of many conflict situations. If children have a belief in their own worth and potential, they are much more likely to value and respect others. Teaching social behaviour means growing the ability to understand, share and express feelings appropriately. Children with competent communication skills, who are effective listeners and who can co-operate and express feelings appropriately, are better equipped to manage in the classroom.

A social behaviour curriculum includes responsibility for and empathy towards others. It includes helping children to put themselves in another person's position, to see themselves as part of a group, to learn from others, to be receptive to others and their perceptions and to be tolerant of others' views. Social behaviour means being able to co-operate. I am talking about children being helped to acquire the skills that will help them to work with others not only at school but in their working life. It means being able to make and evaluate decisions—to reflect on decisions and their outcomes—and to analyse situations effectively.

Those attributes of emotional intelligence, which middle-class kids take for granted, are often absent in Nottingham, despite the excellent early years and children's centre work. Social behaviour is not a cuddly add-on to the so-called proper teaching of academic subjects; it is the prerequisite for that teaching and attainment. One head teacher told me this weekend that of a sample group of children who behaved badly in his school, only 4 per cent. attained age-appropriate academic standards when tested.

However, this issue is not only about education. With the respect agenda, we are beginning to understand that if the tackling of antisocial behaviour is to be effective, it must be complemented by the earliest possible promotion of social behaviour. Likewise, the objectives of our health and our skills partners in Nottingham—for example, on improving life expectancy and widening vocational training—will be met only by rounded, socially able young people who can break out of the inter-generational cycle that we are suffering.

I do not necessarily say that social behaviour has to be taught everywhere, but in areas such as mine—in areas that need and want this—we need to do for social behaviour what we have done so successfully for literacy and numeracy. I ask central and local government to reflect on what we can learn from that success. Standards in literacy and numeracy have been raised in—I have scribbled down eight key ways, but I am sure there are more.

First, standards in literacy and numeracy have been given a special place at the heart of the compulsory national curriculum. Targets for improvement have been set and rigorously monitored at national, local and school level. Secondly, head teachers have been trained in effective leadership and management of literacy and numeracy in their schools. Thirdly, schools have been held to account, through Ofsted inspections, for the quality of the literacy and numeracy teaching that they provide. Fourthly, local authorities have received high levels of funding to appoint literacy and numeracy consultants to provide training and support to schools. Fifthly, lead people in schools—literacy and numeracy co-ordinators—have been appointed. Sixthly, massive investments have been made in information and communications technology resources—for example, materials for use with interactive whiteboards—to teach literacy and numeracy. Seventhly, huge efforts have been made to involve parents, even those who are harder to reach, in supporting the teaching of numeracy and literacy in schools. Eighthly, schools are receiving large amounts of Government funding to provide additional one-to-one and group support for children who need extra help to catch up with their peers.

There must be investment in social education in the local education authority areas that need it that is comparable to the investment that we have made, wisely, in the teaching of mathematics and literacy. That investment must be made in supporting children who need help to catch up in social and emotional skills, in ICT, in school-based co-ordinators who are enabled to develop their own in-depth expertise through professional studies in social and emotional learning, and in intensive, funded support for the learning and skills council in order to enable schools to involve parents. I am referring to family social and emotional aspects of learning programmes to parallel the successful family literacy and numeracy programmes.

Some people worry that academic achievement will be squeezed out if school time is needed to teach social behaviour. The opposite is true. Once we equip young people to learn, the academic achievement in what are currently educational deserts will blossom beyond imagination. We need to stop swatting the mosquitoes and start draining the swamp. Since the last debate on this subject, which was three years ago, I have been reinforced in my belief in the value of social behaviour teaching. Everyone—Ministers, practitioners and local head teachers—is starting to realise that that early investment is essential if we are not to waste all these young people's lives and to incur the massive lifetime financial costs of failure.

I recently visited Sweden, which has had the stability necessary to develop the preventive policies required. The standard practice there is for one year's paternity and maternity leave to be followed by the child going into a nursery at the age of one so that their social skills are developed, enabling them to make the best of the academic curriculum, which does not begin to be taught until the age of seven. In Finland, which has the highest academic attainment in Europe, a similar concept of developing a rounded, properly socialised young person is central to its levels of achievement. The lesson is that personal development precedes and facilitates academic achievement.

In Nottingham, we have already started down the road of teaching social behaviour in every primary school. One third of primary schools in Nottingham took part in the social and emotional aspects of learning—SEAL—pilot, which ended in August 2005, and which we are now rolling out nationally. Already the LEA has agreed that it "will roll out the social behaviour programme and make it available to all primary schools in future. We will use all our education improvement networks and key staff such as education psychologists and education welfare officers to promote the good work when they visit schools and to offer training and support to the schools. We will evaluate our work to see what has gone well and build on that with new initiatives."

We are looking to go further. In my capacity as chair of One Nottingham, I am seeking to agree with our partners, including Department for Education and Skills officials, regional advisers and the local education authority, a series of further measures in a Nottingham pilot.

The Minister's colleague, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools, has already written to me stating:

"we support your working in partnership with the LEA to approach perhaps 20 primary headteachers in Nottingham with a view to carrying out a pilot around the teaching of social behaviour which—if successful—could be rolled out across the city".

"in addition to teaching this holistically across the curriculum schools would approach this through a discreet hour, possibly on a daily basis, to give it a comparable impact to the successful teaching of literacy and numeracy. This raises issues of curriculum space, teacher training, and curriculum content which partnerships need to resolve However, neighbourhood renewal funding, which you have offered from One Nottingham, will enable staff training and curriculum development to take place swiftly".

Discussions to make progress in that direction will continue, especially with the local education authority, and notably with Edwina Grant and Councillor Graham Chapman, the director and chair of the children and young people's department.

Ministers, the Department, Ofsted and the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority have already done much to make it plain that such an approach by the LEA and heads will be supported. However, 20 years of indoctrination into a target-driven top-down culture cannot be undone overnight, whatever flexibilities are said to exist in the current system. Excellent people locally, such as those in the LEA and school heads, need to be clearly and constantly reassured that if they do what they know to be right in local circumstances they will not be penalised on inspection.

I emphasise again that this is not a soft option, but the solution to Nottingham's educational problems. Achievement in this area and the measurement of social behaviour attainment has to be at least as tough as it is in the case of literacy and numeracy, with clear and effective benchmarks demanded and consistent year-on-year improvement sustained.

We might also want to think about the messages given by current inconsistencies relating to what we expect schools to deliver in the curriculum. Personal, social and health education is not compulsory in the primary years. Citizenship is compulsory in secondary, but it is afforded little status and is in need of a radical review to bring in the explicit teaching of social and emotional skills. Might it not be time to look again at the curriculum to ensure that it is designed—like the literacy and numeracy curriculums—on the basis of a framework of social and emotional competencies, with a clear progression from zero to 19 to which all our children and young people are entitled?

Once we have established the teaching of social behaviour in primary schools in Nottingham it will be important to do something similar in secondary schools. The social and emotional skills covered there need to build on those developed in primary education and include relationship, family and parenting skills, pre-empting high teenage pregnancy rates and the 58 per cent. of Nottingham births that take place out of wedlock. That will allow us to complete the virtuous circle of effective intervention, not just at primary and pre-school levels, but at the pre-pregnancy stage by ensuring teenagers have a better understanding of how to raise a family, sustain viable relationships and help their children attain prior to school.

It is impossible to overestimate the positive impact that that will have, and not just on crude academic attainment, but on health, crime, skills, quality of life and personal relationships. Enabled youngsters will learn, attain and achieve, and pass on these gifts to their own children, thus busting out of the cycle of inter-generational failure. Not having the will to do it will trap families, and communities such as mine, into repeated failure, underachievement and waste with the accompanying symptoms of bad behaviour in school, antisocial activity on our streets, criminality, joblessness and drug abuse.

The partnership with One Nottingham, the LEA, Government, head teachers and others is addressing the need to teach social behaviour in our primary schools. We can pay lip service to it, or get on and do it. The choice rests with us.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): May I begin by saying how much of a pleasure it is to respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen)? His remarks reflected the close and passionate interest he takes in the future well-being of children and families in his constituency. It is clear that he is closely engaged with some of the most difficult issues in his constituency. I congratulate him on his advocacy on behalf of his constituency this afternoon and I recognise that this issue has not just appeared on his horizon; he has been talking about it for some time. He has had a chance, therefore, to develop his opinions and ideas on the subject in a significant way during the past few years. I know that he has been tackling Ministers at various levels of the Government about this matter through every method known to the Back-Bench parliamentarian, and I congratulate him on his persistence.

I found it interesting to listen to my hon. Friend's list of things to do for One Nottingham, and I wish it every success in its three specific quests. If he manages all of that, I might come to him for advice on how to run a Whitehall Department. There is no doubt that focusing on important issues and tackling them with great gusto is one way of making organisations and partnerships work, and I wish him every success.

My hon. Friend is right to say that social behaviour teaching has a vital role to play in helping to equip children to behave well and to learn, enabling them to take full advantage of the opportunities available to them at school and helping them to realise their potential. If school is for anything, it is to help children realise their potential. The work also contributes directly to the "Every Child Matters" outcomes for children, which is why my Department is so interested in the subject.

My hon. Friend is right to say that, far from being some trendy or peripheral subject that might be thrown in if there is an extra bit of time in the day, such teaching relates to the hard-edged skills that our children need to thrive and that promote good social behaviour, such as anger management, conflict resolution and resilience. If children do not develop those social, emotional and behavioural skills, the real risk is that they will be more likely to disengage from learning, which can, as he described, lead to a downward spiral of poor behaviour and under-achievement.

Most parents, of course, go a long way towards teaching their children such skills, but it is undeniable that some children inevitably receive less support than others, and their development cannot be left to suffer as a result. All children, no matter how well their parents teach them, can benefit from the reinforcement of social behaviour learning in school. Teaching social behaviour needs to be central to children's education. The Government are committed to promoting social behaviour in primary schools. Investing early helps children develop the skills at a young age, and to continue to develop them as they move through primary school.

A key plank of the Department's national behaviour and attendance strategy is the social and emotional aspects of learning programme, to which my hon. Friend has referred, which I shall call SEAL. It is an annoying acronym, but it is quicker to say. The programme was made available to all primary schools in June last year. The five key social and emotional aspects of learning on which it focuses are self-awareness, managing feelings, motivation, empathy and social skills. They are the underpinning qualities and skills that help promote positive behaviour and effective learning. In fact, they underlie almost every aspect of our lives, enabling children to get on with others and become responsible citizens. We are committed to ensuring that the programme is properly taught.

The SEAL programme provides an explicit, structured, whole-curriculum framework and resource for teaching social, emotional and behavioural skills to all pupils. It also provides for the progressive teaching of age-appropriate skills development from the foundation stage to year 6, and I welcome my hon. Friend's support for it.

To be fully effective, heads and other school staff must feel some real commitment to the work. It follows that the programme is better if it is voluntary, and individual schools should be able to determine the best way of taking the work forward. They are best placed to assess the needs of their pupils and school, and how to make best use of the SEAL resource. Most schools undertake related work, and SEAL builds on the good work that is already present. Teachers report that it can be readily adapted to fit existing work and the unique character of a school.

We do not expect work on SEAL to be confined to a particular time in the school day, although there is no reason why a school should not include a dedicated SEAL period in its programme if it wishes. However, SEAL needs to infuse the whole school and the curriculum. There are ideas and materials for promoting skills across the curriculum through existing work, so schools do not need to devote significant amounts of extra time to SEAL work; it can be threaded through the school day.

As my hon. Friend said, SEAL also makes a helpful contribution to the delivery of aspects of PSHE and citizenship. Evidence from primary schools shows that the non-statutory framework provides a good basis to deliver effective programmes of citizenship and PSHE. I recognise that there are arguments for including PSHE in the compulsory part of the curriculum, but there is no evidence that it does not work when delivered properly and voluntarily.

I am pleased to say that the evaluation of the SEAL pilot programme carried out by London university's Institute of Education was positive. SEAL had a major impact on the development of children's social, emotional and behavioural skills, as my hon. Friend argued in his speech it would. Teachers reported that it created a calmer environment in the classroom, contributing to improvements in learning and attainment. Again, my hon. Friend suggested that such teaching would do so. In key stage 2 national test scores, schools implementing SEAL and other aspects of the primary behaviour and attendance pilot made consistent improvements across all subjects from 2003 to 2005. They were above the national average for maintained primary schools. There is some evidence in the evaluation that the programme can make the sort of impact that my hon. Friend suggested.

The Department's standards fund is providing just over £7 million to help schools and local authorities implement SEAL in the current school year. The aim is for about one third of primary schools to be implementing some or all aspects of SEAL by July. The programme is on target, and interest in schools is high and positive. My hon. Friend will be interested to know that a similar sum has been allocated for next year to continue the SEAL roll-out. A key principle is to support schools to develop experience and expertise in this area of learning, and to encourage them to share it with others to promote the national roll-out.

In that regard I was interested to hear what my hon. Friend said about Nottingham, his constituency and council. I am pleased to hear about the commitment in Nottingham to teach social behaviour in primary schools, as is my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools. My hon. Friend quoted from a letter that she has written to him on the subject. She takes a particular interest in the subject, and she is absent today only because of other duties.

I am also pleased to hear about the strategic approach that my hon. Friend is promoting and that the local authority and local partners are taking. I understand that Nottingham has been involved with the development of SEAL for some time, originally volunteering to join the pilot, which always shows good spirit. It is well placed to implement the programme throughout the local authority. I am pleased about the enthusiasm for it in Nottingham, and I am pleased to hear that many schools are adopting it and others plan to do so in the next school year.

My hon. Friend in his various capacities has had discussions with Nottingham about testing out approaches to strengthening the impact of SEAL locally. From his remarks, he clearly believes that that is the way forward in his area. I understood what he said about the particularly great need in his part of the world to teach social behaviour. I understand that Nottingham city council is to develop leading primary schools so that they become specialist centres of excellence for programme implementation and coaching. There will be a high skills capacity among staff using the SEAL resource, and they will then help support the development of school staff and other children's services professionals in the area. It is a commendable and positive way forward.

Schools already have sufficient freedoms in place to devote more time to SEAL if they wish. However, using the power to innovate would provide reassurance and certainty for heads. The Department is ready to advise about that. We will watch closely what Nottingham does, looking with interest at the pilot that my hon. Friend and other local partners, including the local authority, develop in order to take SEAL forward.

I agree with my hon. Friend that we should not confine our attention to primary schools.

Mr. Allen: One additional factor that we can bring to the party is the involvement of One Nottingham. It has some neighbourhood renewal funding, which could be used to match funding when the Department and the local education authority deem it appropriate.

Maria Eagle: That is interesting. It is important to allow local leeway, because every area is different. Different resources might be brought to bear on the programme from place to place. Some areas will not focus on it in the way in which One Nottingham has decided it ought to do so. I welcome that, and I am happy that the Department and my officials keep in touch with my hon. Friend and local partners about how best to take the programme forward.

We should not confine our attention to primary schools. They are a good place to start, but my hon. Friend is right that these things do not stop at aged 10, and we can all learn more as we get older. That is why a pilot is under way in six local authorities to help establish what works best in promoting social, emotional and behavioural skills in secondary schools. SEAL and the secondary pilot are part of a wider national programme to improve behaviour in schools. In the most recent Department stakeholder survey, three quarters of teachers said that pupil behaviour is generally good. However, any level of bad behaviour is too high, and it can disrupt disproportionately the school and class in which it takes place. That is why such a programme is needed. It has three main strands: developing children's social, emotional and behavioural skills, strengthening the capacity of schools to manage behaviour, and reinforcing parental responsibilities for their children's behaviour. We must not forget the parents; of course they have a role to play.

To strengthen capacity, all schools now have access to high-quality materials for behaviour management auditing and training, and helpful support from more than 200 Department-funded behaviour and attendance consultants working in local authorities. In addition, the Education and Inspections Bill going through Parliament will give school staff an unequivocal statutory right to discipline pupils for bad behaviour.

Parents are the key to building a culture of respect in schools. They have the single biggest influence on their children. My hon. Friend may know that the SEAL programme includes work with parents. It provides ideas for fun and engaging activities that children can take home and play with their families, so that they can share with them SEAL learning and every theme of the programme. It is important that we also teach some of those skills to parents who perhaps missed out during their childhood.

I hope that between us we can provide a better environment in which children can learn to learn. I thank my hon. Friend for introducing the debate, and I wish him luck with One Nottingham and the local authority.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Two o'clock.

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Nepal

Motion made and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Coaker.]

9.30 am

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): Sir Alan, I have no registrable interests to declare, but I am chairman of the Britain-Nepal parliamentary group. In that capacity, I was asked to lead a parliamentary delegation to Nepal recently, which was funded by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Our visit in March this year followed on from a visit in January 1996, when I led the last Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation to Nepal. The Nepal we found in 2006 was very different indeed from the one to which I went 10 years previously.

In 1996, there was a flourishing, working, multi-party parliamentary democracy in Nepal and, as far as I am aware, no political detainees in that country. The media were conspicuously free. The Maoists were unheard of and their insurgency had not started at that point, although it began later that year. The king, now sadly the late King Birendra, was universally respected and admired in the country for bringing it to a new condition of constitutional monarchy and genuine multi-party parliamentary democracy.

The Nepal we visited in March was sadly wholly different. Parliament had not sat for four years, and an unknown number of people were subject to political detention, including Mr. Madhav Nepal, the leader of one of the major political parties, the Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist). Notwithstanding its name, that is a democratic party. The Maoists were in effective territorial control of approximately three quarters of the country. In private and, in part, public conversation, the current king, King Gyanendra, was subjected to a degree of venom and vitriol that made me wonder whether I was going about in late 18th-century France.

As the Foreign and Commonwealth Office predicted, King Gyanendra declined to see us, although we noted with a degree of wry amusement that in the week we were in Nepal he none the less, according to the Himalaya Post, found time to receive a special envoy from Fidel Castro at the same time that he declined to see a delegation from the mother of Parliaments.

Should the Minister feel that his Department's funding was in any way not put to good use, I assure him that we were able to strike at least one solid blow for the restoration of parliamentary democracy. We paid a call on Speaker Ranabhat, who led the last Nepalese IPU delegation to this Parliament in 1999. Although Speaker Ranabhat was deprived of his Chamber, he was still the official Speaker. I asked him whether he would kindly show his Speaker's Chair, which is beautifully carved in British oak and was a gift from this House to the Parliament of Nepal in 1992, to the British parliamentary delegation. He kindly agreed to do so.

We went along to the House of Representatives, and the forbidding steel-grille gates were unlocked and opened. The large outer doors were also opened, and in we went to see the Chamber covered in dust sheets. That has been Nepal for the past four years, with its parliamentary democracy covered in dust sheets. Speaker Ranabhat took his Chair, and we stood on either side of him. The Minister will be glad to know that that picture received front-page coverage in every leading newspaper in Nepal—in the English and, more importantly, Nepalese languages—and appeared under the headline, "After 4 years, Ranabhat sits on Speaker's chair".

I do not think that any of us who went to Nepal thought in our wildest and most optimistic dreams—there were no huge grounds for optimism—that within five weeks to the day of our departure from Kathmandu, the Speaker's Chair in the House of Representatives in Nepal would be occupied for the real opening of the Parliament. That, of course, took place last Friday. The credit for it lies with one group and one group alone—the people of Nepal, most particularly the 100,000 or so who took to the streets in Kathmandu and the thousands more who took to the streets in other towns and cities all over Nepal to demand the restoration of their Parliament.

Those were the people who had the courage to defy the curfew, the risk of arrest and imprisonment, and the bullets, although tragically some 14 people were killed. I would like to say that we in the House salute the people of Nepal for the bravery and determination they have shown and for their achievement in getting their Parliament restored to them.

The restoration of Parliament in Nepal is, I suspect, just the beginning; it is certain that the hardest part still lies ahead. Last week the King gave in, but the Maoists will be a far harder nut to crack. They have a stranglehold on the country that is based on brutality, fear and intimidation. That stranglehold, as I have said, extends territorially to at least three quarters of Nepal.

We received a striking illustration of the nature of that stranglehold at our meeting with the chief district officer in Biratnagar. He told us that, as a result of intimidation of school management committees and head teachers, the Maoists had a total ability to walk into any school in his district, with the exception of those in the immediate environment of the city of Biratnagar, take over the classrooms and spew out their propaganda to the children and students. To translate that into UK terms, that would be approximately the same as a United Kingdom in which the whole of Northern Ireland, Scotland, Wales and England with the exception of London, the Birmingham conurbation, the Manchester conurbation and Newcastle were under Maoist control.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. Friend, but I am sure that he would like the rest of that conversation with the chief administrator to be put on record. We were told not only that the Maoists could access schools at will, but that teachers had to pay a month's salary in extortion to them and that most small businesses had to pay them protection money.

Sir John Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is absolutely correct. I shall refer to that dimension of Maoist influence in a moment.

The real winners from last week's events, welcome though they were, stand to be the Maoists. They can claim, with real credibility, that the king's capitulation was due to them and the crowds that they brought on to the streets, not to the leaders of the democratic parties. They have also got themselves into a pivotal position, and Nepal's political and democratic development will depend on what they are or are not prepared to agree to.

As of now, the Maoists have given up nothing of substance in return. They have given no assurance that they will not resume their murder, torture and brutality or their exercise of fear and intimidation when the ceasefire that they announced ends in three months. They have given no assurance that the financial extortion to which my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) referred will not continue. That extortion extends to all parts of the country and, we were told, even to payments to Gurkha pensioners.

The Maoists have given no assurance that they will not resume their blockades, which emptied the markets in Kathmandu and precipitated a business and food crisis in the capital in a matter of days. Finally, they have given no assurance that they will lay down their arms and, most critically, that they will allow free and fair elections to take place.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): During that recent visit to Nepal, did my right hon. Friend find out whether the Maoists are sponsored or supported in any way by the authorities in neighbouring China?

Sir John Stanley: All the conversations that we had during our visit, and all those that I had previously, indicate that this Maoist group, rather like Shining Path in Peru, receives no backing from the Chinese Communist party.

Nepal is on a knife edge between a democratic or a Maoist outcome. As of today, it is far from clear which way Nepal will fall, and it would be a brave person who said that a democratic outcome was assured. The political democratic leadership is relatively aged and, it must be said, somewhat tainted by the past. Central Government institutions are weak, and we must always remember that Nepal has the most favourable terrain in the world for terrorist operations. In this country, someone in need of help and protection will receive it in a matter of minutes, but in the hills of Nepal it will not arrive within minutes or even hours—it is several days' walk away. That factor alone puts the hill people and, indeed, many others in Nepal at the mercy of the Maoists.

As a sovereign country, Nepal is of course responsible for determining its own destiny, but there is little chance of a successful long-term democratic outcome if the country is left unaided and unsupported by its friends and the international community. Britain is in a unique position among the members of the international community. It is Nepal's longest-term friend, and that friendship goes back nearly 200 years, in which time Nepalese soldiers—the Gurkhas—have served in the British armed forces with conspicuous distinction, in peace and war. Britain is the European Union member state with far and away the closest relationship to and greatest influence in Nepal. It is also much more trusted there than either of Nepal's most immediate big neighbours, China and India.

The central question facing Nepal today is whether the hugely welcome restoration of parliamentary democracy will be permanent or simply a transitional phase towards a Maoist state. If that were the outcome, it would be a tragedy for the people of Nepal. Almost as significantly, however, it could have profound regional consequences because Nepal is surrounded by three large neighbours—India, Pakistan and China—all of which are heavily armed and, of course, nuclear powers.

I do not for a moment suggest that the British Government can single-handedly prevent such an outcome, but they must do their utmost to ensure that a Maoist state is not the end result for Nepal. At this critical moment for Nepal, and in the light of our 200-year friendship, the British Government need to give Nepal a new and altogether higher priority. The people of Nepal deserve nothing less from us.

9.48 am

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I rise both to compliment the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) and to complement what he has said in his speech. I compliment him on leading the delegation, on which I was proud to serve, and I have a feeling that the other Members who served on it, including the hon. Members for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) and for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) will want to pay tribute to him for leading it with courage, strength and great passion. Indeed, his feelings about Nepal are sincere and go back a long way.

I was very moved by what I saw on our visit, which was my first to the country, and I want to draw a few conclusions to complement what the right hon. Gentleman said. I should say for the record that we spent some of our time looking at aid issues and that I am a Parliamentary Private Secretary at the Department for International Development. My comments today, however, are about the political situation in the Foreign Office context.

Before we went there, Nepal was showing all the signs of a failing state. It is an incredibly poor country, with per capita income at $260 a year and falling. Indeed, the figure might be only as high as that owing to the value of remittances, which come from the perhaps one quarter of all Nepalese people who now live outside the country. That says something about the situation inside the country. Some 60 per cent. of the economy of Nepal is agricultural, but that means that about 30 per cent. of the economy relies on tourism. The five-star market, as it is called, has completely collapsed. I read from figures published this week that in April alone there was a 2.2 per cent. fall in the value of the tourist economy in Nepal, which is obviously dependent on that contribution.

Nepal is also a country where there has been overt and covert censorship in very large measure. It is fortunate that we can mark today as world press freedom day, and I should like to draw attention to one or two conclusions that the Federation of Nepalese Journalists has reached about the past 15 months. Over that time, during which the king had absolute power, two journalists were killed, 88 were tortured, 11 were abducted, 282 were attacked and 707 were arrested. Similarly, 39 journalists were displaced and 250 sacked, and 108 newspapers were forced to halt publication. The Nepalese Government also blocked at least 25 news websites, raided private radio stations and banned broadcasting of news from all stations for a few months, until the supreme court stepped in to allow FM stations to broadcast news again.

Not all those incidents were the responsibility of the Government of Nepal, however. The figures released by the Federation of Nepalese Journalists suggest that the Maoist forces killed at least two journalists, and assaulted and threatened many others over a 10-year period, and have continued to bar them from reporting freely from the Maoist stronghold, even though the leaders of the Maoists have time and again expressed their commitment in principle to respecting press freedom.

According to one international organisation, Reporters Sans Borders—I am not sure what language that title is supposed to be in—more than half the cases of news censorship worldwide in the past year were in Nepal, with 567 incidents reported and 145 journalists physically attacked or harassed. A country where there has been no press freedom over the past 15 months or so is a difficult country for the outside world to explore.

We also know that about 3,000 people were detained without trial for various durations, leading up to the abortive local elections in February. I would be interested to hear any news from my hon. Friend the Minister about whether people continue to be held without trial or whether more have been released—Mr. Nepal, who is one of the high-profile prisoners, has been released, but information about others would also be welcome.

To return to the list of hallmarks of failing states, there have also been several instances of soldiers and members of the armed police being arrested for crimes such as robbery. The ability of the Royal Nepalese army, which is one of the biggest armed forces in the world, successfully to control its vast number of new recruits is questionable.

Over the period of the king's autocratic rule, we also saw the systematic replacement of non-sympathetic members of the supreme court. I understand that the new Nepalese Government have already said that that process will stop. However, I hope that it will not only stop but be reversed and that an objective means of appointing members of the supreme court in Nepal will return.

Over a long period, there were also the bhands—or transport strikes—which seemed to become more and more potent, and were used by more than one element in what passes for the political process in Nepal. One of those strikes ended just before we arrived there. Nevertheless, when we travelling out to Biratnagar we saw minibuses and buses that had been newly torched and trees that had been newly felled over roads. I subsequently discovered that a gunfight between Maoist forces and the Royal Nepalese army took place in the village close to the one that we visited while we were there. Fortunately, we did not hear it or get close, but as the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling and the hon. Member for Cotswold mentioned, there was clearly a lot of intimidation going on, even outside the strikes.

Throughout much of April we saw 100,000 dissenters on the streets, as the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling said. It is reported in the news today that the Nepalese Government have announced that 19 people, rather than 14, died at the hands of the military and the armed police during the days of dissent and demonstration.

In response to the developing situation over the past year or so, Britain, like other countries across the world, has quite rightly stopped supplying lethal military aid to Nepal. We have continued to provide Nepal with training in human rights issues for military staff, as well as anti-mine technology and training in its use. No one would argue with that, but we need to consider whether—and if so, how quickly and in what quality—any military aid from Britain would be increased to Nepal, particularly as its problem is an internal one, rather than one from an external aggressor. The situation is made even more complex by the fact that the very people from whom protection is required are in some form of alliance with the democratic parties. I therefore suspect that the Minister will say that there is no likelihood of any early restoration of military aid in its previous form.

There is a sad situation in Nepal, which is changing but getting no less sad. The threats are no less than those that the right hon. Gentleman described. In retrospect, the week that we were there was crucial for King Gyanendra. It was probably his last chance to oversee a peaceful transition of power back to the forces of democracy in a way that could have guaranteed the continuation of the constitutional monarchy. Much has happened in the past 18 months to destroy trust in the king and the position of the monarch, in his relationship not only with politicians but with the people themselves. I have mentioned the hallmarks of the failing state, many of which followed from the king's autocratic rule. They were not chance happenings but deliberate actions by the king and those acting on his behalf.

While we were in Nepal, the leaders of the seven-party alliance were trying valiantly to keep the lid on popular republican sentiments. My guess is that in the long term they will be seen to have failed in that. I have a sneaking suspicion that the king might no longer be in office 12 months down the road. That might be the outcome of the constitutional settlement that is now being sought. I believe that Nepal will probably fail as a constitutional monarchy because the king hung on to power for far too long, although I admit that there were very difficult circumstances.

We know that the Maoists have declared a three-month ceasefire, which is welcome, but it should be regarded with some suspicion, not least because it does not cover the likely date for a general election. The monsoon season will start shortly so, as we heard from the Nepalese ambassador with whom we had a positive meeting yesterday, the first credible date for an election is in September or October.

We must not underestimate the size of the task that faces the Nepalese Government. Restoring Parliament is only the first step in the long path to restoring faith in democracy. Inside Kathmandu, the threads of democracy are being maintained for as long as possible. Outside Kathmandu, for reasons mentioned by my colleagues the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling and the hon. Member for Cotswold, democracy has disappeared, and it needs to be reinstated from first principles. That cannot be done while there are forces in Nepal that seem to insist on undermining the process.

Despite the conciliatory words of the Maoists, it is clear that we will not achieve democracy in Nepal while parts of the country are controlled by terror and intimidation and by unaccountable forces. That is the principal challenge that faces the seven-party alliance.

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): My hon. Friend gives a fascinating account of what he and his colleagues discovered in Nepal. In his discussions with representatives of the seven-party alliance, did he gain any notion of what the alliance thought would be the prospect of the Maoists going down the democratic road?

Tom Levitt: The seven-party alliance drew up the 12-point agreement with the Maoists, and it was re-endorsed a couple of weeks before our visit. That agreement is the straw at which everyone is clutching. My knowledge of the Maoists is not sufficient for me to make an absolute judgment as to their reliability, but we must also consider their capacity to deliver on a deal with the democratic forces.

It is worth pointing out that, by definition, an alliance of seven parties will have problems in keeping together. There are many other political parties in Nepal; some of them could have been described as "two men and a dog", except that I did not see many dogs. There must as a result be tensions within the alliance, particularly on how far the 12-point plan can be trusted and worked on. I hope that we will be able to help all seven members of the seven-party alliance to build a capacity to function as democratic parties, because there are real questions about their democratic credentials. By any standard Nepal is a young democracy, and it did not reach democratic maturity before starting to take backward steps.

On the party political front, we should not forget that there are some very influential and powerful individuals in Nepal. Among those placed in position by the king over the past 18 months, some will want to follow the pro-monarchist agenda, and their political programme may include undermining and trying to split the seven-party alliance. We must be aware of that possibility.

I return to the Minister's question. It is true that the Maoists must be defeated, but it has to be a political defeat. Everyone agrees that there is no chance of a military victory against the Maoists because of the country's terrain, poor communications and so on. However, the 12-point plan has to be the means by which the political parties call the Maoists' bluff. If they can deliver on the 12-point plan, they will have taken a huge step forward. They have to call their bluff.

While we were in Nepal, some of us were putting a case for the political parties to call the king's bluff and taking up the king's nominal and perhaps superficial offer of elections. The parties chose not to do so. Perhaps they will now call the Maoists' bluff, saying that it is either the 12-point plan or nothing, with the constitutional election and decisions about the future of the constitution at the heart of the process.

It was a challenging week, but enjoyable. We were joined by two Members of the other House. Between us we represented the three main parties and the Cross Benches, but we spoke as one. Our delegation's analysis of the situation was pretty uniform. I thank the Foreign Office for having enabled the delegation to take place. I hope that we can look back and say that we helped at the start of the long process of restoring democracy. Democracy is much more than elections, and Nepal has a long way to go, but I hope that the Government will take up our historic role of being a good friend to Nepal and give whatever assistance they can to help that country become a stable, satisfactory and successful democracy.

10.7 am

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): During the last 40 minutes, in excellent speeches from my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) and the hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt), we have heard as good an analysis of the situation in Nepal as one could expect to hear anywhere.

I completely agree with the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend showed admirable leadership during the visit. He ran the exercise with military precision—not once were we allowed to deviate, hesitate or turn from the programme. In my judgment, it was the most effective parliamentary delegation in which I have been involved, largely due to its composition: as well as the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend, it included my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) and two Members from the other place, Baroness Northover and the Earl of Sandwich. It was a very cohesive and effective team.

I thank our ambassador to Nepal, Keith Bloomfield, and his colleagues. Our embassies are always supportive when parliamentarians make such visits. One senses that our embassy to Nepal went the extra mile on this occasion—partly because it was the embassy's idea that we should visit—but it made a special effort, which made our visit far more effective. I agree with the hon. Member for High Peak that, in a modest way, our visit might have made a difference.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling said it all in his introductory remarks. This was my second visit to Nepal; I was there in 1994 as a United Nations observer of the second general election under the old king. It is sad that those elections led eventually to the country's demise, but I have been left with a feeling of the nation's unpredictability. Every time I thought that I could see my way through the situation, something happened that made me realise that I was wrong. I would not like to put any money on what the outcome might be—on what the situation will be in a year's time.

When we arrived, the protests were just beginning. They then escalated until the day of action in early April—the violence reached a level I had not expected. Two days were earmarked as days of action, but the protests went on for 12 days. Hundreds of thousands of people were on the streets: there was a shoot-to-kill curfew, yet they still went out, and some people were killed. I had not anticipated that happening. Then the king slowly and incrementally capitulated. First, he asked the political parties to appoint a Prime Minister, and then he said he would restore Parliament, whereupon everything stopped—in Iran, however, such protests led to the Shah going—and everyone seemed to be happy. That was mainly because the political parties had achieved their objective with the king, which was getting democracy. They were not for getting rid of the king—the Maoists were in favour of that.

It was a rollercoaster ride, and the people showed a great enthusiasm for democracy. Frankly, I would be happy if in our country we were to have hundreds of thousands of people out on the streets campaigning for Parliament. [Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold says from a sedentary position, perhaps tomorrow they will show some enthusiasm.

However, to stick to the issue in hand and to refer to a point that has been made, of the various components in Nepal, the Maoists' motives is the most unclear. The Maoists control large swathes of the country with the stated aim of deposing the king and establishing a one-party state, but then they signed up to the 12-point agreement with the political parties, and now they have acquiesced in the current situation, so there has been a complete switch there.

I am not sure that I would trust the Maoist parties further than I could throw them; my advice to the political parties of Nepal—and, indeed, to the British Government—is to sup with them using a long spoon. One suspects that they have entered into an agreement for short-term, opportunistic reasons. Perhaps both sides of that dispute feel they cannot win. The Nepalese army cannot beat the Maoists, and the Maoists are looking at a Royal Nepalese army that is bigger than the British Army, and they have probably reached the conclusion that they cannot beat it. Therefore, there is a stalemate of sorts.

In our initial briefings after we arrived, we were told that there were three components of the situation in Nepal: the king, the political parties and the Maoists. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling said, there is also a fourth component, which is the people of Nepal. They have been through tremendous hardship. One should never underestimate their commitment to resolving this situation and to fighting for what they believe in if they feel they can achieve their objectives.

The human rights situation was of great concern to us all. We had a meeting with the foreign press delegation, and the hon. Member for High Peak has set out the breaches of human rights. While we were there, the leader of the Communist party was under house arrest for no good reason. I ask our Government to keep a close eye on that as we engage with the Nepalese Government.

I wish to make four points on our policy. First, will the supply of military equipment to the Nepalese army be reviewed? Rightly, anything that could be used for an aggressive purpose has been withdrawn. Do we now feel that the situation has changed? We should take note of the role of the army; it was loyal to the king when he was the Executive power, and one assumes that it will be loyal to the Government now that Executive power has been bestowed upon them. If the Government are committed to free and fair elections, does that change the situation? Perhaps the Minister has not yet reached a conclusion on that, but it should be reviewed.

Secondly, the heart of our policy should be to give full support to the Nepalese Government to hold free and fair elections. That is the only way forward; without them, the situation will collapse into anarchy. I encourage the Nepalese Government to announce a date—even if it is in September—as soon as possible to show their commitment. I hope the embassy will encourage them to do that. Thirdly, the basis of the way forward is the 12-point plan that was agreed in the early stages, in March.

Fourthly, my humble advice to the Government is to stay close to the Indian Government in this. India is the nation of influence in Nepal, alongside us. In truth, because of India's proximity, it has more influence. It is also affected by the Maoist insurgency, which has spilled over into the north-east corner of that country. I think that will focus India's mind.

Nepal is in for a very rocky time. The king has lost all credibility, and it remains to be seen whether he will survive. I do not think the incumbent has a useful role to play and his son is manifestly unpopular, so I do not know what the future holds for the monarchy. I believe in constitutional monarchy, as we have in our country, but I cannot see an obvious candidate to restore credibility in Nepal. That, however, shows the unpredictability in that country.

10.16 am

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) on securing the debate. My grandmother lived her entire life in the same house in West Malling in his constituency, and my grandfather, Gordon Browne—spelled correctly, with an "e" on the end of his surname—continues to be an enthusiastic constituent of the right hon. Gentleman. Therefore, I am very familiar with the part of the world he represents.

Sadly, I am less familiar with the part of the world we are discussing, and I am probably the only participant in this debate who has not been to Nepal. Nevertheless, I will endeavour to offer thoughts and suggestions on how this Parliament and the British Government can best seek to ensure a happy resolution of the difficulties in Nepal that we have been reading a lot about in newspapers and elsewhere.

In debates of this sort, I am often struck by how much cross-party consensus there is. I suppose that is inevitable, because all of us in this Parliament are liberal democrats—with a small "l" and a small "d". Rightly, there is a consensus that the objective in respect of Nepal is to seek to establish open, liberal government by the people and for the people, and for elections to take place, and for there to be all the other traits that one associates with an open society—press freedom, fair trials, multi-party democracy.

However, as is often the case, the situation is difficult, awkward and less clear-cut than we would wish. There is not a group of good guys we can straightforwardly support and a group of bad guys we can oppose. That presents a difficulty for the British Government, and we should be cautious not to overestimate their ability to resolve the situation. Obviously, we should try to participate, but, ultimately, the decisions will be made by the Nepalese.

However, I would be interested to learn from the Minister what is the approach of the Government. As I understand it, the United States of America—inasmuch as it is playing an active role—is not willing to deal in any way with the Maoists in Nepal. Do the British Government have a different approach? Do they consider that they are most likely to be effective in their role if they try to deal—in a reasonably even-handed way, if possible—with all the different groupings and factions, or does the Minister think that that is unlikely to be an appropriate or effective way to proceed?

The first of the other areas that I hope and believe that the Government will consider is political education. In this country, we take for granted the formation of democratic parties and all the paraphernalia or infrastructure that goes with democracy and elections. It is easy to say that there should be elections and that we should get a Parliament up and running, as if that could be done at the drop of a hat, and people, including me, often sound somewhat glib in saying it. However, there is a lot of organisation to be done in terms of not just the mechanics of polling day, but the political parties—what they represent ideologically, and whether they are coherent and hold together in a proper, identifiable way, and do not keep splintering into lots of different groups, as that makes it impossible for people to exercise any choice that can be transferred to the delivery of power. All that is a difficult process in any country that, unlike ours, is not a mature and stable democracy.

Anything that we as a country can do to educate and assist in those processes should not be underestimated. Diplomacy or Government action of that sort does not seem very dramatic and does not seem to make a huge impact, but on the ground, in a quiet way, we can contribute to the mechanics of democracy and political education in Nepal.

Also, I hope that we can foster and encourage exchange schemes and other ways of increasing knowledge and understanding of Nepal among those in Britain and the west. In that regard, tourism is a considerable asset. I suspect that most British people who are familiar with Nepal have been there as backpackers between school and university, or after leaving university, or on visits of that type. So, there is a contemporary, as well as an historical, link that many British people have with Nepal. I hope that that will be of benefit to our country in trying to engage the Government in Nepal, whatever form they take, in the months and years ahead.

The second point that I would like the Minister to touch on is how we go about trying to exercise influence in Nepal. We have an historical tie with that country and that part of the world, but are we also working with our partners in the European Union and, more importantly, India, with which, of course, we have great historical links and which has a direct strategic interest in the region? Of course, India is a democracy—a somewhat imperfect one, but considering it has more than 1 billion people, it is an extraordinarily effective and stable country in terms of how power is exercised there. It has lessons to teach many countries in the world, including Nepal. All our links with the Indians will be extremely welcome in trying to resolve any problems in Nepal.

The last of my three main points is about what role the Government can play in alleviating poverty and distress in Nepal, not only because that would evidently be a good in itself, but because any country that seeks political stability and rational decision taking will also benefit from its people enjoying a certain basic standard of living. It is hard to interest people in liberal concepts involving elections, free media and so on when they have more immediate concerns about their material and physical well-being. The Government, the Department for International Development and the Foreign Office take an interest in the provision of aid to Nepal, and we play a financial role. I would be interested to learn how that is tied in with diplomacy and a potential political solution.

I conclude by repeating a remark made by the hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt), which summed up the way forward as we in the House see it. He said, "The Maoists must be defeated, but it has to be a political defeat." That is an astute summary of the position as I understand it, which is that we should seek a constitutional settlement and that the 12-point agreement is the basis on which to move forward. The outcome that we should be seeking is effective multi-party democracy, not change from one undesirable system to another.

I wish the Minister and the Government well in assisting with achieving that end, and wish the people of Nepal a happy, settled, stable political future in which they are not constantly buffeted by different forces that make it hard for them to live free, open and decent lives.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mrs. Anderson. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) on securing this timely debate, and on the knowledgeable and thoughtful way in which he introduced it. On my very first day in the House, I went into the Tea Room and an elderly Member said to me, "Be very careful what you say in this House. There is always an expert on every subject." My right hon. Friend is exactly that expert. As I went to sleep last night, I had a vision of him towering over me, listening to everything that I said, so I must be careful in case I incur his wrath.

My right hon. Friend led a worthwhile delegation to Nepal between 19 and 23 March, as my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) and the hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) have said. Like my right hon. Friend, I hope that that delegation has contributed, in a very small way, to setting that country on the path on which I hope it has embarked.

My right hon. Friend was absolutely right to focus on the people of Nepal, because we wish those people to continue along the path of democracy. We want their economy to recover, we want them to prosper and we want them to live in peace and harmony with each other. They are a very pleasant people—hard-working, industrious and peace-loving, as was shown by how rapidly they went from demonstrating against the authorities one day to celebrating the result of their success the next. As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South said, in other countries there would still have been looting many days later, as was the case after the fall of the Shah of Iran and the fall of Ceausescu in eastern Europe.

Hon. Members have ably described what happened in the past, and have alluded to our great historical links with Nepal over almost 200 years, as well as our strong bonds with its people through the Gurkha connection. Those bonds will continue. That is why the British Government, as a great friend and historical ally of Nepal, should remain heavily engaged in the peace process, which we hope will go from strength to strength. I want to concentrate, in a prospective way, on one or two things that could happen in Nepal, and I want to ask the Minister a few questions about how the British Government will react and help.

As has been said, before we arrived, there was a three-cornered political situation that involved the king, the Maoists and the parliamentary parties. The king, I hope, has now conceded power in a real way; it seems that there is no way back to the former situation, at least in the short term. Whether the king survives as constitutional monarch is a much more open question.

The king has ceded real power, but what about the political parties? As has been said, there are seven of them, and they have vastly differing views. Some of them wanted the country to be a republic even before the current situation arose, so it is unclear what their real political aims are. But as the Minister said, interestingly, in an intervention on the hon. Member for High Peak, it is the capacity of those political parties to deliver, and whether they will remain a cohesive whole, that is the critical question.

Part of the problem up to now has been the weakness of the political parties. We wish them well, and we wish them a transition into a mature phase, so that they can at least prepare for elections. The first question I want to ask the Minister is what help will we give through the rights, democracy and inclusion fund to the people and the political parties in Nepal as they prepare for the elections. A great deal of work must be done. An interim constitution must be drawn up and the election procedure must be sorted out.

I have no idea how advanced the registration of voters is. I suspect that people will probably need to start almost from scratch, but how that can be done when the Maoists control a large chunk of the country remains to be seen. The process presents considerable difficulties, and I think it unlikely that an election will take place in September or October. A more realistic timetable would mean it taking place next year, but perhaps the Minister will give us the Government's view on the matter.

The third of the three groups involved is the Maoists. Much has been said about the Maoists this morning, and I have asked the Minister a series of questions on Nepal, both before and after our visit. On 26 April, the Minister answered one of my questions, and it is worth quoting that answer because it gives the Government's official view of the Maoists. I asked what assessment he had made of them, and the answer was:

"The Maoists carry out widespread human rights abuses including torture, kidnap, rape, murder and extortion for money. These acts of abuse perpetrated against innocent civilians, including women and children ... the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) reported that a large number of children were being used by the Maoist forces as helpers and porters during military operations ... We are aware that the Maoists have been involved in importing explosives and detonators into Nepal. The Royal Nepalese Army seized over 5,000kg of commercial explosives and in excess of 30,000 commercial detonators in separate operations, in March 2006, along the Nepal-India border. We cannot judge what proportion of the overall total of Maoist imports this represents."—[Official Report, 26 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 1152–53W.]

There is clearly a serious threat of insurgency and it requires every effort to be made during the political process, through negotiation with the Maoists by the democratic parties, which will be coupled with activity carried out by the police and the Royal Nepalese army.

As we learned in Northern Ireland from the situation involving the IRA and other paramilitaries on both sides, the solution was partially military, but it was political to a much greater extent. That is the message regarding how to deal with the Maoists. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling said, there is a real prospect that Nepal could degenerate into a fully fledged Maoist state—a very unpleasant regime, which would be very deleterious for the people of Nepal. Every effort must be made by the whole international community, through every organ we can use in Nepal, to prevent that from happening. The one achievement of today's debate should be to issue a warning about that possibility, and I hope that we can prevent it from happening.

Moving on from the political aspects, what is to be done for the future? Mention has been made of the Royal Nepalese army, which is big and increasing in size and which comprises almost 90,000 people. It has the capability, if given the right equipment, to deal with some of the problems. The key issue was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South. If the political situation moves, as we hope it will, satisfactorily towards democracy and a situation where peaceful and fair elections can be held, the British and Indian Governments, the United States and the international community will have to review their policy of not supplying any form of lethal equipment to the Royal Nepalese army.

The situation is pretty dire at the moment, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling alluded to it. If the army gets information that a serious incident involving Maoists has taken place in a rural area 200 miles from the capital, Kathmandu, for example, it can take the soldiers days to get there because the army simply does not have enough helicopters to lift them into position. When the soldiers get into position, they probably will not have enough equipment to deal with the situation.

Indeed, while in Nepal, we heard of the Maoists cutting a major water pipe. When the army went to repair it, the soldiers were attacked by the Maoists and several were killed. If the situation is to be properly brought under control, the Royal Nepalese army needs to be equipped with proper communications, helicopters and night vision for the Islander aircraft so that the troops can see what is going on, as well as proper co-ordination of intelligence, particularly with the Indian authorities. Those basic things must be put in place, and must be carefully considered by the international community.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

Another policy that must be reviewed is that on ministerial visits. I have asked the Minister a question about those before. In the run-up to what I hope will be free and fair elections—I am sure my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling will want to take a full part in that process—we can show the political parties and the people of Nepal that we are there to help in whatever capacity they want. The policy on ministerial visits urgently needs to be reviewed and such a visit in the relatively near future would be a helpful step to give political parties some encouragement.

As the hon. Member for High Peak said, there must be a proper, independent judiciary. That is crucial. Some important judgments have been made in the past about the constitution and the role of journalists, and I hope that the political parties can now put in place a team of judges and a judicial system, in a way that is seen to be free and fair, that can act in controversial situations, which will undoubtedly arise.

One such situation is preparation for elections. There is an urgent need to establish a fully independent electoral commission. Legal questions will arise from the work of that commission, which should be considered by a free and fairly appointed judiciary.

Mention has been made of the press and the media, which are critical in any fledgling democracy. While in Nepal, we were lucky enough to meet the independent organisation of journalists, and I have no doubt that it will continue to press the political parties to allow full access to all strands of media, including independent radio, which reaches most parts of Nepal, but also television and a free press. I hope that that takes place as part of the emerging, reassuring process that follows.

Tom Levitt: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman was pleased to note that the Nepalese Cabinet has already lifted the controversial ordinances concerning broadcasting. That will set Nepal in the right direction in respect of press coverage.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to that. It is a good sign that things are moving in the right direction.

I want to give the Minister plenty of time to reply, but my final point, which I referred to earlier, concerns this country's connection to Nepal via the Gurkhas. We were lucky enough to go the Gurkha headquarters in Kathmandu and to be briefed fully on the situation. One emerging factor concerning the Gurkhas is that the British Government have, quite rightly, altered the rules on leave to remain in this country, so that Gurkhas who have served in the British Army can apply to this country—although they will be discharged in Nepal—and expect to be granted leave to remain, provided that they have given exemplary service. It is expected that most will apply.

That is a good thing in many ways, because of the foreign remittances that they send back home to their families, but it gives rise to another problem, which concerns the number of social security staff already required to look after the existing 10,000 or so Gurkha dependants in Nepal. There is a severe concern about those social security staff, particularly regarding their wages.

I do not expect the Minister to be able to deal with that problem today, but I hope he will consider it. The well-being of those dependants in Nepal is a critical part of our responsibilities to that country, and it would be reprehensible if anything were to happen to that network. If the Maoist threat lessens, the job will get easier, but for some of those social security staff travelling to dangerous rural areas in the west of the country, this is a hazardous job for which they are paid a pittance. It would be helpful if the Minister looked into that.

This has been a thoroughly well informed debate. Let us hope that, through it, we can send a message to the British Government that we fully support the people of Nepal. We desperately hope that the path to democracy will be smooth and that they can defeat the Maoist threat. However, like all difficult paths, it is bound to have its ups and downs. Let us hope that, on the whole, we can progress smoothly.

10.40 am

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mrs. Anderson. May I add to the thanks offered to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) for securing parliamentary time to discuss Nepal at this critical point in its history? I know how deeply he feels about Nepal, and I have benefited more from this short debate, in terms of learning about the nature of a country, than I have from any other.

The right hon. Gentleman gave us an excellent and most revealing comparison between the conditions that he encountered in 1996 and those that he encountered this year. His colleague, the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway), helped with that comparison, too, I must say—the right hon. Gentleman made this point—that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has received great value for money from his trip. I get lots of e-grams and intelligence about the situation in Nepal, but there is nothing to beat the reports of colleagues who have been out there to look carefully at the situation on the ground. I have learned a great deal.

This debate should tell us something about the value of inter-parliamentary visits. They do not usually receive very good press in this country, because they are considered a freebie, with MPs jaunting around the world. However, in the past hour or so, we have heard a report that it would be impossible to obtain from any other quarter. If it came from the intelligence services or an independent agency, there would probably be allegations that they had their own agenda. Through this cross-party visit, however, we have received invaluable information.

As the right hon. Gentleman and others reminded us, the king's restoration of Parliament is a great victory for the forces of democracy in Nepal. It offers the prospect of a resolution to the 10-year conflict there, and a return to peace and stability. I remember that when the right hon. Gentleman first spoke to me about that country, he told me that it was such a dreadful shame that a place he encountered 10 years ago had been driven into such straits.

This morning, the right hon. Gentleman has given us the hope that there is a way through that situation. He quite properly drew our attention to the central feature of the past couple of weeks: the great bravery of the Nepali people and their determination in the face of great difficulty to try to reinstate some of the order that previously existed.

The one point that the right hon. Gentleman did not mention was Bhutan, although he might wish to intervene on me. On the "Today" programme this morning, I heard an extraordinary interview in which somebody said that politicians should try to make us happier in life. I am not sure whether it was during the interview, but people talked rather glowingly about how the Government of Bhutan measure their success or failure in terms of the happiness of their subjects, yet 100,000 Bhutanese refugees live in Nepal, having been driven there in the most brutal conditions.

I was hoping that the right hon. Gentleman could tell us about that, so I shall give way.

Sir John Stanley: As the Minister has invited me to intervene, I shall do so in the traditional way, by posing questions to him. I could have spoken at considerable length about the Bhutanese refugees, but I wanted to ensure that all my colleagues had the opportunity to make their remarks.

Is the Minister aware of what we learned for the first time in the Sanischare Bhutanese refugee camp? Sadly, the then Government of Nepal were engaged in gross discrimination against the Bhutanese refugees. Their policy was to prevent those people in the refugee camp from trading and working outside it, and even from leaving the country when third countries were willing to take them. Will he examine those issues, which I have indeed put to the Foreign Secretary?

Dr. Howells: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has posed that question, because it is very serious. I am also glad that it has been asked in this debate, because the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), I think, said that we must warn people of the size and requirements of this great task. The right hon. Gentleman's question is one of the most urgent. I was aware of those inequities, and I hope that our ambassador can convince the new Nepali Government that they must take the matter seriously and that the whole world is watching. That will be an indicator of the civilising spirit of the new Government.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: As probably the only Member of the House to have visited Bhutan and met its Foreign Minister, I say to the Minister that there is a willingness among the Bhutanese Government to help to resolve that problem. Bhutan is only a small state with 500,000 people, and it cannot realistically repatriate all the refugees. In fact, the total number of refugees is not the total number who were driven out of Bhutan, because many refugees have been born in the camps.

Dr. Howells: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that. I am sure that those facts have been noted. We know that the country's economy is under great strain for many reasons, and that is one of them.

Tom Levitt: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Howells: Yes. I must make a bit of progress, though.

Tom Levitt: I appreciate that. It is worth putting it on record that the then Nepalese Government were preventing not only third-party movement, but the movement of those people who wished to return to Bhutan and whom the Bhutanese were willing to take back—much to the frustration of the international agencies running the refugee camps and entirely at their cost. There will come a time when the agencies are no longer willing to take on that burden on their own.

Dr. Howells: Yes, indeed. That is a situation that I am afraid we are all too familiar with in other parts of the world. I hope that the Nepali and Bhutanese Governments, and outside agencies that can work to broker a much better arrangement, will prioritise that issue.

The United Kingdom went to great lengths to persuade the king not to take power in Nepal, and, once he had, to hand it back to the political parties. In December 2004, in response to rumours of a palace coup, our ambassador in Kathmandu sought an audience with the king to forewarn him of the consequences of a takeover. The ambassador said that a palace takeover

"would put the King in the front line and the monarchy at risk, provoke violent street demonstrations and push the parties into the arms of the Maoists, divert security resource from fighting the Maoists, and risked losing international support which was posited on multi-party Government and a democratic Nepal."

The accuracy of that prediction was illustrated precisely by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling when he expressed his great fear that the real victors would be the Maoists, if we were not careful. I am afraid that that is all too true.

Looking back, those words were prescient. We welcome, therefore, the king's decision to reinstate Parliament. With that announcement, the security situation has begun to improve. The parties have called off their protests and the Maoists have announced a three-month ceasefire, although the details of how it will be implemented are not yet clear. There is a prospect of a new Government with the full authority to reciprocate a ceasefire, open negotiations with the Maoists and bring an end to the conflict, which has cost the lives of some 13,000 Nepalese. That is an extraordinary number when one thinks that we lost about 3,500 people over all those years in Northern Ireland. The fact that 13,000 Nepalese have died is a terrible indictment of what has happened in that country.

We do not to underestimate the considerable risks and challenges ahead. To begin with, it is imperative that the Maoists make a complete and permanent end to their violence, and commit to abandoning their arms for ever. That has been done in other parts of the world, and it can be done in Nepal.

As right hon. and hon. Members have said, the Royal Nepalese army will need to undergo what amounts to a cultural shift to turn it into an accountable, professional army under civilian, democratic control. We have been working hard to achieve those ends through our efforts to promote human rights. I will come to the question of human rights, which the hon. Member for Croydon, South raised, in a moment. The political parties will need to show vision and leadership, and learn lessons from the past, and there will need to be a peace process involving the Government and the Maoists to bring the conflict to a permanent conclusion.

As right hon. and hon. Members have said, the first sittings of the reconvened Parliament on 28 and 30 April were landmark occasions. Parliament agreed on elections to a constituent assembly and to talks with the Maoists, which we hope will pave the way for a permanent peace settlement. As colleagues have pointed out, the UK is an old friend of Nepal, with a long history of involvement. We are already working with our key international partners such as the US and India—we have urged that work should be done with the Indians; the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) raised that issue—and the EU to take full advantage of the opportunities in Nepal.

In co-ordination with our EU partners, we will consider lifting the agreement not to meet Nepalese Ministers from the king's Government. If appropriate, we will look for an early opportunity for a UK Minister to visit Nepal. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] We will examine ways to ensure that the new Government are equipped for the challenges that lie ahead. As a lifelong mountain climber, I very much hope that that Minister will be me, so that I might see the Himalayas, although I must admit that I limit my climbing to the Alps these days. One can be rescued there by a red helicopter. I have not seen any of those in the Himalayas, and I am getting on a bit now.

The first priority will be to establish a mutually agreed ceasefire. We welcome the Maoists' announcement of a three-month ceasefire, and urge them to make it permanent. We remain absolutely clear about the fact that the pursuit of political ends through violent means is absolutely unacceptable, as is a one-party Maoist state. In response to what the hon. Member for Cotswold said, I hope that that is a clear enough warning from the House to the Maoists. That is very important.

The UK continues to support the transition of the Maoists back into a democratic political party participating in a multi-party democratic system. I heard the comments made by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling with a great deal of optimism. The fact that the Marxist-Leninist party that he mentioned is now a democratic party, so much so that its leader is under house arrest—

Sir John Stanley: Was.

Dr. Howells: Was under house arrest. That is a great encouragement, as it shows how such parties can change.

The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) asked whether the Maoists in Nepal are being financed by the Chinese Communist party. Maoist parties have always been completely beyond my comprehension, as a student of the left, so I was glad to hear that they are not.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South mentioned the spread of the influence of Maoist insurrectionists into north-east India. There have been problems with the Naxalite insurrectionists in that area, who have committed some brutal murders. The hon. Gentleman is right to emphasise that aspect, and we must work closely with the Indian authorities to consider those links.

I am sure that most people in this country would be amazed to discover that Nepal has a large population. I initially thought that it had a population of about the same size as that of Scotland, but nobody knows how big it is. It is estimated to be between 25 million and 28 million. It is a huge population, which is very influential on India.

The hon. Member for Taunton talked about developing the economy and about the need for us to become more familiar with Nepal through tourism and other means. I do not know, but perhaps the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling, as his interest continues, will be able to tell us whether Nepal might be able to supply India with electricity using hydroelectrics. Perhaps its future lies in becoming more involved in that burgeoning area of economic growth in northern India, which is not far away and with which it has many organic links and links through river valleys.

Such progress is happening in Afghanistan, and the great hunger for electricity in Pakistan and India could be met by Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan—those mountainous countries in the western Himalayas—via Afghanistan. Perhaps there is a similar future for Nepal. That is an important question.

The UK continues to support the transition of the Maoists back into a democratic political party, which would then participate in a multi-party democratic system, but that must be predicated on the Maoists making a demonstrable commitment to ending their violence and putting their arms beyond use for good. I make it absolutely clear that that is the only way that the Maoists will gain legitimacy in our eyes. The hon. Member for Cotswold was right to say that and the point must be emphasised.

We stand firmly behind the efforts of the political parties to take the reins of government and bring an end to the Maoist insurgency. We will make every effort to ensure that they are prepared and equipped to do so, including through our development assistance and the global conflict prevention pool. We are working with our international partners on co-ordinating the international effort as closely as possible.

Several hon. Members asked about military supplies to the security forces. Following the king's takeover of power last year, we put military assistance under review and cancelled the package of military assistance that we had intended to donate to Nepal using funds from the global conflict prevention pool. At this stage, it would be premature to make any formal commitments on security assistance. Now that there is a new Prime Minister and the prospect of a new Government who will take forward negotiations with the Maoists, we will consider requests from that new Government, but so far there have been none.

In the context of the new political landscape in Nepal, our conflict prevention objectives will inevitably shift. If the new Government can make progress on a peace process—

Janet Anderson (in the Chair): Order. We must move on to the next debate.

Science (UK Universities)

11 am

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to introduce this debate on a big and important subject—probably too big for a half-hour debate. I am aware that many of the issues that are relevant to this discussion, particularly in respect of the pressures on some university science departments, are being dealt with elsewhere in the House, notably by the Select Committee on Science and Technology, which is chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis).

I wanted to introduce this debate for several reasons, some of which are personal. Although my constituency is not a university centre, it does have two of the biggest science laboratories in Britain. The National Physical Laboratory is Government owned and supported by the Department of Trade and Industry. Among other things, it has responsibility for the atomic clocks and, therefore, Greenwich mean time, and it houses hundreds of highly qualified physicists. The Laboratory of the Government Chemist has been privatised in recent years but retains its core function of standard-setting for chemistry. It also employs many highly qualified chemists. As a result, the Twickenham-Teddington area is populated by a substantial number of high-quality, highly qualified scientists.

I meet those scientists on the doorstep. They convey their anxiety about the state of science in the universities, on which they depend for their graduates and in which many of them alternate in taking university appointments. There is particular anxiety about the closure of chemistry departments in London, including those at Queen Mary's and King's college.

I have a long-standing interest in science education at school level. I secured an Adjournment debate two years ago following the introduction of the Adrian Smith report on maths teaching, and I maintain a close interest in it. Although the Government have undoubtedly taken some action, I am still concerned that some of the underlying problems, which are linked to the problems of the university science sector, remain.

On a personal level, I am of that generation of people who found it easiest to get into university by doing maths, physics and chemistry. I spent two years in chemistry laboratories before deciding that economics was a somewhat more amenable, perhaps easier subject. However, I have since then repaid my debt to science by having a son who is a very good post-doctoral scientist. He briefs me on the strengths of British centres of scientific excellence—for example, Imperial college, where he works—but also on some of the frustrations of academic scientific life.

I mentioned my background because it has some relevance to this debate. When I studied science in the 1960s, there was a great deal of interest in the role of science, prompted mainly by the Harold Wilson Government. There was the Trend report on the future of science, out of which emerged the conventional wisdom that Britain was very good at science but not very good at applying it to wealth creation. That general idea has existed for the past 30 to 40 years, but increasingly people are questioning the underlying proposition, for two opposite reasons. One is that

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

Britain has become better at translating science into wealth creation. There is a great deal of evidence that many good science-based industries are developing in the UK. On the other side, there are questions about whether we can continue to be so complacent about the excellence of British science. There are genuine worries on that score, but before I detail some of them, I should like to start with a positive observation.

British universities certainly have a great deal to be proud of in the science field. This country has 1 per cent. of the world's population but 10 per cent. of all cited papers and 11 per cent. of cited papers that attract the greatest degree of scientific attention, and 12 per cent. of the university science prizes. An indicator has been developed to compare the performance of science faculties across Europe—obviously, there are arguments about methodology—and British universities topped the list, having six of the 10 top university departments in Europe.

On several measures, Britain does very well. I recently saw a reference in New Scientist to the fact that Britain now may stand ahead of the United States on some measures of the standard comparators for the life sciences. There is a very good story to tell in some areas.

Equally, there are some serious worries, on which I shall focus. As the Minister knows, much of the anxiety centres on the large-scale closure of university science departments. There have been 79 in the past six years and, in the past 18 months, there have been suggested closures of five chemistry departments, although I believe that the one at Sussex university has been reprieved. The Royal Society of Chemistry has argued that, on the basis of current policies on research funding allocation and teaching funding allocation, it would expect another 20 to close in the next 10 years. The 60 chemistry departments that we now have would be reduced by a further 20. That is on the basis of current trends—it may or may not happen.

Those comments were sufficient to produce the reasonable consensus that was summarised by the Science and Technology Committee, which expressed in moderate language what is a growing worry in the science community. It stated:

"Whilst it may be exaggerating to say that university STEM departments"— that is, science, technology, engineering and mathematics departments—

"are in crisis, it is clear that their numbers are experiencing a sharp decline. Since the financial situation faced by these departments is unlikely to change in the short term, it is reasonable to assume that there will be further closures. If this process continues unchecked, there is a very real possibility that the system will no longer be able to provide sufficient numbers of STEM graduates to meet the needs of the UK economy."

That conclusion has been reinforced by businesses. Companies such as GlaxoSmithKline and AstraZeneca have publicly expressed their worry about the decline, particularly in chemistry. The CBI has likened the position of university science to a car crashing in slow motion. That may be an over-dramatisation, but businesses as well as academics have a view on the matter.

What are the sources of the problem? I shall touch on four issues which are, to some extent, interconnected: first, the overall funding position; secondly, the availability of students to do science in universities; thirdly, the formula that is used for allocating funding for science teaching; and, fourthly, the basis of allocation of science research in universities. Those four things are interrelated. For example, a university department may have a brilliant set of teachers and researchers, but it would find it difficult to continue to function if there were no students. Indeed, Alasdair Smith, the vice-chancellor of Sussex university, described that scenario as one that had led him to take a pessimistic view.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that another factor is that businesses and universities have not learned how to live with each other, talk to each other and develop together? There are small signs of interaction—the odd professor here, the odd studentship there—but there is no concerted activity in this country to bring them together as suggested in the Lambert report.

Dr. Cable: I have seen the Lambert report, which highlights that long-standing underlying weakness. As I said in my introductory remarks, I sense that much progress has been made in that direction, but it is starting from a very low base.

Let me briefly run through the four headings and pose some questions to the Minister. First, on overall funding, this is not the place for me to try to score points about the funding of science. There are other forums in which we can debate that much more satisfactorily. I note that the Chancellor has considerably increased the overall envelope of science funding—I acknowledge that. It was referred to at considerable length in the Budget, within the framework of long-term science policy.

I do not question the overall level of science funding, which is substantial and growing rapidly, but its emphasis. Perhaps the Government assume a little too easily that it is helpful for them to fund practical research and development that the private sector may well be willing and able to do itself, rather than basic science, which is, after all, a core function of Government. There is an issue about whether there is too much emphasis on supporting private sector R and D, whether through tax credits or direct support, rather than basic science, but I am not raising here the question of the overall spending envelope. I want to spend more time on the other two questions.

The most worrying and fundamental issue is that there seems to be a long-term problem about students coming forward to study the basic sciences: physics and chemistry, and mathematics, which is closely linked. The statistics are worrying. The 15-year trend since the early 1990s shows a decline in the number of students taking those subjects at A-level of about 35 per cent. in physics, 22 per cent. in maths and 12 per cent. in chemistry at a time when further and higher education has been expanding rapidly. That has been a decline at a time of general expansion of higher education, which is worrying. I appreciate that the short-term picture may give more grounds for optimism and I shall give some of the more detailed figures that have emerged this year covering the period when the Government have been in power.

There has been a decline in the number of people taking A-level physics from 28,800 in 1997 to 24,094 in 2005. That decline has been continuous throughout that period. Physics is the really bad story. Chemistry is more mixed. There has been a decline from 36,430 to 33,164 but over the last two years there has been a considerable improvement. In biological science the position is more or less flat. In mathematics there has been a catastrophic decline from 56,000 in 1997 to 46,000 last year, but the last two years have seen a considerable improvement from a worryingly low level.

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is particularly worrying that the decline has been even more precipitous in the maintained sector? The students who are doing maths, physics and chemistry are increasingly in the independent sector, and 40 per cent. of A grades in physics and maths A-level come from children in the independent sector. Is that not even more worrying?

Dr. Cable: I was going to make exactly that point. It is ironic that the private sector, which used to be regarded as the preserve of effete generalists, is increasingly one of the few sectors of education where people do double maths, which is a necessary foundation for advanced physics. That is worrying because people in the maintained sector who have limited means are simply not getting access to teaching in those important disciplines.

Various reasons have been advanced for the problem of science education and attracting students. First, students are being attracted more to vocational disciplines. There is a big growth in demand for law, medicine, architecture and so on and those choices are rational. The research into rates of return on education suggests that students in those disciplines make a higher return than students who do basic science, so the choice is rational from their point of view.

The Royal Society of Chemistry also makes the point that people may just be looking for easy subjects and makes an invidious comparison, contrasting the decline in the number of chemistry students with the rapid increase in media studies students. I shall not make pejorative remarks about media studies because it is too fashionable to do so, but there is a jarring contrast between the two experiences.

The basic problem relates to skills; the figures unearthed by Adrian Smith in his report two years ago still have great force and are worrying. He noted then that there was a shortage of 3,400 in the number of maths teachers. Do the Government know whether that figure is now better or worse? Adrian Smith noted, for example, that one third of all science teachers had a third-class honours degree or less and that many had no maths beyond GCSE but were trying to teach advanced-level science without having the basic skill levels. The age profile was also adverse, with a high proportion being over 50.

I have only a couple of minutes left so I shall try to draw the threads together. Will the Minister update us on what has happened since the Adrian Smith report and say whether the Government are going to act on some of his more radical recommendations—such as giving greater weight to maths GCSEs and A-levels and university admission, and allowing undergraduates to teach maths in schools, using their training at that early level?

The third issue is the funding formula for university science teaching. One of the most damaging decisions to have been made in recent years was that by the Higher Education Funding Council when funding for science teaching, which used to be at the level of 2.1 per cent. of the baseline, was arbitrarily cut to 1.7 per cent. Putting it crudely, the non-science faculties seem to have ganged up on the scientists and switched a large amount of funding out of university science departments, which effectively had a cut of 20 per cent. They used a circular and damaging argument. They noted that science faculties were doing much less laboratory work and concluded that they needed less money. However, they were doing less laboratory work because they had less funding. That decision was very damaging. Is that a matter on which the Government have any say? After all, they are the main funding body for universities. The decision seems to have been taken by a Government quango and the feedback I have received is that if that decision could be reversed, it would do more than anything to improve the position of science departments in universities.

I am conscious of the time and my final comment relates to the funding formula for university research—the research assessment exercise. Traditionally, it has been based on peer review and the logic of that is clear. Universities are independent and it is right that university academics should have a peer review process, but it has thrown up all sorts of damaging anomalies. Universities are sacking teaching staff to boost their research rating—Brunel university was cited recently as an example—and actively poaching research staff from other universities. Several senior vice-chancellors, Mr. VandeLinde at Warwick and the vice-chancellor of Bristol, have seriously criticised the system as being highly distorting, producing a perverse market and doing great damage to university research.

I understand that the 2008 review will be conducted more subtly and the Government announced in the Budget that they will introduce a parallel shadow system based on metrics—fund-raising for university departments. If there is such a fundamental flaw in the system, why must we wait until 2013 for an improved system, if that is what the Government's recommendation proves to be, to have any effect?

11.18 am

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing this debate and raising this important subject. He has taken a deep and long-standing interest in the matter and has a significant constituency interest.

I shall start by setting out the context. To be fair to the hon. Gentleman, he set out the context relating to science in our universities. We currently have a strong science base and we are second only to the United States in terms of world-class research. We comprise 1 per cent. of the world's population, yet we do 5 per cent. of the world's science and produce 9 per cent. of all papers and 12 per cent. of scientific citations. That is a substantial and positive record.

[Bill Rammell]

From the time when the Government came to power in 1997 to the end of the current spending period, we will have more than doubled spending on UK science and research. That is a substantial and sustained commitment and better than what went before. However, I hasten to add that we have no grounds for complacency. That is why, two years ago, we published our "Science & innovation investment framework 2004–2014". It is a strategy for the decade and aims to make Britain the most attractive location in the world for science, research, development and innovation.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the research assessment exercise. Our science base is built on the excellent research carried out in our universities. University research has always been a progressive, constantly developing force and for the past 20 years the key driver of that change has been the research assessment exercise—the RAE. It has moved us to a point at which we can say with confidence that taxpayer-funded research in this country is world-class. Let me explain what I mean. Between the last two RAEs, in 1996 and 2001, the number of university departments achieving the top 5 or 5* rating rose by a very significant 65 per cent. to more than 800. Those excellent departments now employ more than half of all the researchers in the higher education system.

Like the research that it evaluates, the RAE has changed and improved every time that it has been conducted, and it will continue to change in the current round. For the next exercise, in 2008, the cliff-edge effect—the difference in financial consequences between a research rating of 4 and a rating of 5—which has rightly concerned many people, will be addressed by the introduction of an institutional quality profile. There will be fewer peer review panels than in the last exercise, in 2001, and greater recognition of applied and interdisciplinary research. Those changes have been widely welcomed in the sector.

The hon. Gentleman referred to our announcement at the time of the Budget of a new stage in the development of research assessment. We are seeking to move after 2008 to a metrics-based system of assessment that continues to recognise and drive quality, but which at the same time reduces the burden that the RAE places on universities' time and staff resources. We have already established a working party, which I am pleased to report is making significant progress.

The hon. Gentleman asked why we have to wait. We have made it clear within the review that we are conscious that significant preparations are already under way for 2008. It is therefore the Government's presumption that the 2008 RAE should go ahead, incorporating a shadow metrics exercise. However, if an alternative system is agreed and widely supported and a clear majority of UK universities favour an earlier move to a simpler system, the Government will be willing to consider that. We need to withhold our judgment for now. There does not appear to be a groundswell of support for such a move at the moment, but if there is we will be prepared to consider the issue.

I come now to the importance of strategic and vulnerable subjects, on which the hon. Gentleman rightly commented. That issue has been the focus of recent publicity. It needs to be borne in mind that one strength of our university system is university autonomy. The idea that we can plan at micro level, from the centre in Whitehall, the exact numbers of science places throughout the country is wrong. That would not serve our best interests. However, we have asked the Higher Education Funding Council to monitor whether there may be areas in which current provision seems out of step with the national need, to consider whether action may be needed and, if so, to advise on what might be done. That said, it is important to recognise, as the Roberts review did, that there is not a crisis in science in our universities. When we talk about the number of undergraduates studying science, it is important to remember that, across the board, there are 120,000 more students doing science subjects today than there were in 1997.

Mr. Boris Johnson: Could the changes that HEFCE recommends include allowing it to restrain a university from closing a science department if it wanted to do so?

Bill Rammell: I do not think that we need that kind of central command and control. However, we have made it clear that where there is a vulnerability, where an institution is considering the position of a science, technology, engineering and mathematics—STEM—subject, there should be early intervention in the form of discussions with the institution. Indeed, that has been happening. The hon. Member for Twickenham commented on the situation at Sussex university. It is because of early intervention through HEFCE that we will not see a loss in terms of overall student places. As a result of co-operation with neighbouring institutions, the numbers will be upheld.

It is important to place the issue in the national context. The hon. Gentleman commented on the recent changes. Overall in the last couple of years, there has been the beginning of a turnaround. There was an increase of 10 per cent. or more in the number of students accepted last year to study subjects such as maths, physics and chemistry, and there have been further increases in the application round this year. That is significant. We are not complacent, but it does give us grounds for cautious optimism.

Another key factor is what the Government are doing to stimulate demand from students. In the longer term, that must be the area in which we make progress. Again, we set out in the Budget significant commitments to science teaching. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a commitment of £32 million-worth of new measures over just the next two years. We are committed to increasing the number of pupils achieving level 6 in science at key stage 3 and good science grades at GCSE, raising the number of science A-level entries and increasing the percentage of teachers with a physics, chemistry or maths specialism.

The hon. Gentleman commented on the quality of graduates going into science teaching. One figure that gives me a degree of encouragement relates to the proportions of people going into the teaching of physics, chemistry and maths. The number of people doing that with a 2:1 or a first-class degree has risen significantly in recent years.

With regard to meeting our overall commitments, we have made it clear that we want to provide pupils with more opportunities to study three separate sciences at GCSE. We are piloting 250 after-school science clubs to offer an engaging and stretching programme of activities to key stage 3 pupils with an interest and potential in science. We are providing more continuous professional development opportunities for science teachers and technicians.

Our science and engineering ambassadors initiative has a significant role to play, as have the curriculum reforms that we are introducing from this September. At key stage 4, we will maintain the breadth and depth of the curriculum, but it will have greater relevance to today's world, so that young people learn more about the use of contemporary scientific and technological developments and their benefits, drawbacks and risks. I am talking about the practical application of science in society, rather than just learning by rote. To encourage increasing numbers of young people to engage in these subjects, that must be a way forward.

Since 1997, there has been a [illegible] per cent. increase in the number of new science teachers, but the Government are the first to acknowledge that we need to do more. That is why we have made significant increases in the teacher training bursaries and the golden hellos, which evidence suggests are having an impact and helping us to recruit greater numbers of science graduates. We need to get the message across to young people about the significant advantages of undertaking a course of study in a STEM subject.

Dr. Cable: I agree with the Minister's philosophy of not trying to micro-manage universities, but will he address the specific issue of the funding formula for teaching, which seriously disadvantages science departments? Are the Government addressing that?

Bill Rammell: May I just finish my point? I will then address the point made by the hon. Gentleman. I was talking about the financial benefits of taking a STEM subject. The graduate earnings premium is 30 per cent. for a STEM subject compared with 23 per cent. for a non-STEM subject. Taking a STEM subject will significantly enhance the earning capacity of a graduate over their working life. We need to get that message across to young people in this country.

On the hon. Gentleman's question, we have made it clear that the Government and the Higher Education Funding Council want to distribute grant to take account of variations in the actual relative costs of teaching different subjects. That is why the collection of cost information in accordance with full economic cost principles should be an important step forward. That will happen in 2008. An important related point is that if laboratory-based science is relatively underfunded, something else must be relatively overfunded. It is not enough just to argue that it would be helpful for science to receive more funding in the formula. Anyone with credibility who proposes changes to the formula also has to find sustainable and convincing evidence that other subjects are relatively overfunded.

We are pursuing a number of other initiatives. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) raised the issue of knowledge transfer. The higher education innovation fund, whose funding envelope we have successively increased, is helping and supporting the spread of scientific ideas for practical business purposes in this country—

Army Barracks (Deaths)

Janet Anderson (in the Chair): In the event of a Division in the main Chamber we will adjourn for 15 minutes, and for 12 minutes in the event of subsequent Divisions. I advise hon. Members that the case of Derek McGregor at Catterick barracks is sub judice, so I advise them not to refer to that case.

2.30 pm

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mrs. Anderson, on this important occasion. This is a serious debate on a serious issue, and I confirm to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence that I am a great admirer of our armed services and the men and women who choose to serve for our defence. I want our Army to be the best in the world and to reflect the democratic values that we cherish.

Yet members of the armed forces who protect our rights are entitled to have their rights protected by us. The Army should be a model of best practice and set a benchmark from which others can learn. That is the context for the debate and we need a dialogue on it.

We last had an opportunity in Westminster Hall to debate the subject of deaths in Her Majesty's armed forces on 4 February 2003, when the then Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, Kevin McNamara, highlighted the courage and bravery of a number of families campaigning for a public inquiry into deaths in Army barracks. Three years later, those families are still looking for answers and, as the Deepcut and Beyond families group, they have grown in number and strength. Those families were brought together by the tragic loss of children who died when serving the Crown, most of whom had brothers or sisters and some of whom had children of their own. Those soldiers joined the Army full of optimism, believing in the future, and learned to have pride in their regiments. They knew that they might have to fight for their country but they believed in the future. Somehow, something went terribly wrong.

Every family has a different story to tell. Whatever the circumstances of an individual death, each family had cause to doubt the explanation given. It did not make sense. Bereaved families did not feel that they had been told the truth, and they did not believe that those responsible for their children's deaths, whether by action or neglect, had been brought to justice or held to account. While the Army establishment closed ranks and denied there was a problem, the press drew the seemingly obvious conclusion that there was a conspiracy to cover up the truth and to allow perpetrators to go unpunished.

The Deepcut and Beyond group has provided support and assistance to Army families who have experienced the traumatic and otherwise lonely upheaval of the sudden death of a child. Setting out the public case for a full inquiry, the group has developed a comprehensive agenda for change. The group is calling for civilian oversight to ensure effective investigation of complaints and deaths. It argues for structural involvement of families to ensure that lessons are learned and measures put in place to prevent future deaths. Through Daniel's Trust, bereaved families have been able to work with the independent forces helpline to give confidential advice to young soldiers suffering bullying, and have engaged directly with the officers responsible for fulfilling the duty of care.

Inspired by such positive thinking, I am pleased to report the formation of the all-party group established on 1 February 2006 with the aim of providing a parliamentary focus on non-combat deaths in the armed forces, and to support the Deepcut and Beyond families group in seeking truth, justice and change. Membership of the group reflects genuine all-party backing for the families and extends throughout the United Kingdom. I was proud to be elected chair of the group, with the support of Lord Ashley as secretary and a fine panel of officers, some of whom are in the Chamber today. I am optimistic that we can assist the Government and the Ministry of Defence in rising to the challenge of Deepcut and beyond.

I shall pose a number of questions and seek the support of the Minister for a number of propositions. Do we still need a public inquiry? The Minister has previously addressed that issue and is considering his response to the Surrey coroner and the recommendations of the Deepcut review conducted by Nicholas Blake, QC. The Deepcut families, who have lived with the investigation since their children's deaths, are looking in detail at the report and its findings, but the demand for a public inquiry is not going away.

At the conclusion of its investigations into the four deaths, Surrey police outlined the case for a broader inquiry that would

"address the sufficiency of the Army's care regime in respect of young soldiers in training at Deepcut and beyond."

It was Surrey's summary recommendation

"that the Ministry of Defence considers a broader investigation of", first:

"Whether the risks identified at Deepcut are replicated across the wider" training establishment

"and how these may relate to the issues of self-harm, suicide and undetermined deaths"; secondly:

"How the Army's care regime may be further improved"; and thirdly:

"How independent oversight might help the Army define and maintain appropriate standards of care for young soldiers."

At the conclusion of a three-week inquest into the death of James Collinson, the jury returned an open verdict. Exercising his duty to report on matters where action should be taken to prevent the recurrence of fatalities, Her Majesty's coroner wrote to the Secretary of State, stating that

"because of the limited constraints of an inquest, there has to be some way of resolving the unease that there seems to be abroad about Deepcut."

Expressing his respect for the armed forces, he said that "they deserve that these matters be addressed thoroughly and independently so that rumour and speculation can be met head on."

His personal view was that the MOD should take whatever steps necessary to restore public confidence in the recruitment and training of soldiers at Deepcut and elsewhere. He said:

"I personally believe that they should have nothing to fear from an inquiry held in public".

Although Nicholas Blake does not back the families' call for a public inquiry, he argues for Deepcut families to be given complete disclosure of statements collected by Surrey police, as well as the opportunity to put new evidence before a judicial authority that can order fresh inquests. I welcome that proposal, but it does not address the Surrey coroner's view that an inquest will not satisfy the families or meet the public interest requirement for an effective investigation of these or other deaths. As the coroner has told the Secretary of State, his office does not have the expertise, resources or statutory powers needed to conduct such an investigation, so that alone is not the answer.

The Minister knows that the problems that give rise to public concern and drive those pressing for an inquiry do not stop at the perimeter fence of Deepcut barracks. Truth, justice and change go together. Each theme constitutes an aspect of the public interest in holding an inquiry. In order to restore public confidence and rebuild the relationship of trust between the Army and public, the Secretary of State should consider the value of an inquiry that fully involves the families of the victims, and that is independent in character, judicial in authority and open to the public. An inquiry should be able to examine and make recommendations concerning all the agencies that need to be involved for the effective investigation of sudden deaths and all bodies that could help prevent them. It is bold; it is joined-up; it is a profoundly democratic solution.

I want to clear up a couple of misconceptions. First, it is claimed that the Deepcut and Beyond families want 1,748 deaths to be investigated. As far back as the Adjournment debate in February 2003, Kevin McNamara pleaded with the Minister to provide statistics that would enable the headline figure of 1,748 deaths from non-natural causes between 1990 and 2003 to be broken down so that the scale of the problem could be accurately assessed. Deepcut and Beyond families repeated the point in evidence to the Select Committee on Defence, pointing out that an inquiry would be remiss if it failed to demand full disclosure of such information prior to conducting its own scoping exercise. I hope that the Minister will consider the statistical information available and see whether a breakdown can be given of the presumed causes of death and their locations.

Secondly, I want to address the claim that an inquiry into Army deaths would be a disproportionate drain on the public purse. The Victoria Climbié inquiry, headed by Lord Laming, revolutionised our thinking about child protection. It cost £3.8 million. The Macpherson inquiry into the death of Stephen Lawrence became the authority on institutional racism and changed the face of modern policing. It cost £4.2 million. By comparison, the Army has responded to criticism of its regime for young recruits by investing an additional £43 million in training. Last year alone, it spent £33 million on recruitment advertising. What price can be put on restoring the confidence of mums and dads? What price can be put on justice?

The Deepcut and Beyond families group believes that a public inquiry into Army deaths, headed by a senior judge, would provide the best vehicle for achieving truth, justice and lasting change. They believe that such an inquiry would provide the best vehicle for the Government and the Army to work in partnership with families and learn from their experiences. They believe that such an inquiry, sitting in public, would provide the best opportunity to restore confidence in the Army and they urge the Government not to close their mind completely, but to keep the subject under review.

The second question that I wish to address is what kind of independent oversight we need. I am delighted that Nicholas Blake QC placed his proposals for independent oversight at the centre of his recommendations. The review proposes introducing a legal requirement that all sudden deaths of Army personnel be referred to a coroner. It also proposes that the Ministry of Defence make funds available so that bereaved families can be advised and legally represented at inquests. Nicholas Blake has stated that failure to implement his proposals in full would shift the public interest towards a judicial inquiry, and the Minister will no doubt pay due regard to that.

The Defence Committee has established the case for independent oversight of the armed services, and the Deepcut and Beyond families cogently put their detailed considerations to the Committee that considered the Armed Forces Bill. Let me, however, give the Minister some reassurances: the armed services have nothing to fear and everything to gain from establishing a robust mechanism for independent oversight. The Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland is recognised as a world leader in terms police accountability, and the chain of command of the Police Service of Northern Ireland has been not damaged by the ombudsman's effectiveness but immeasurably strengthened. The armed forces should set their standards of accountability at the level of a world leader.

The effective operation of the armed forces does not require oversight with an independent element—it requires independent oversight full stop. The ombudsman or commissioner must be credible and able to operate without jurisdictional obstacles. His or her powers must be based on statutory authority. The commissioner should be a civilian, selected under an independent appointments procedure, who has independent tenure and their own premises outside the military estate. Legislation should guarantee sufficient funding.

The oversight commissioner should be able to investigate any complaint referred to them and to initiate their own investigations, retrospectively if necessary, if they have reason to believe that it would be in the public interest to do so. The experience of oversight bodies in other countries suggests that problems with frivolous or vexatious complaints can be quite easily addressed through rules of procedure. The commissioner would not be in competition or conflict with the regular complaints mechanisms established through the chain of command or with other procedures that have been put in place.

The oversight commissioner will require sufficient powers so that their staff can operate effectively, including powers to enter barracks, seize documents and tap phones. Obstructing an investigation should be made a criminal offence. The commissioner should make an annual report to the Secretary of State, which should be laid before Parliament. In addition, they should publish research.

[Mrs. Joan Humble]

The commissioner should be able to establish advisory bodies that involve people with particular expertise and skills. The experience of the Deepcut and Beyond families illustrates the value of involving families of service personnel to supplement the sources of information available to the commissioner. An independent families group could, for example, assist in establishing a lay visitor's panel to undertake inspections of barracks and military facilities. I hope that the Minister will take those comments into account when he examines proposals for the introduction of such a commissioner or ombudsman.

How should we deal with deaths overseas? The Deepcut and Beyond families group has highlighted the absence of effective investigation when non-combat deaths occur overseas. The Royal Military Police are not seen as independent and lack the skills to conduct an investigation that would satisfy the requirements of the Human Rights Act 1998. There is rarely local civilian police involvement and there is no independent pathologist, no forensic expert and no opportunity for family involvement.

Although we would expect an oversight commissioner to investigate deaths overseas when called on to do so, Nicholas Blake also looks, correctly, at strengthening existing mechanisms. Compulsory inquests or fatal accident inquiries would assist families in Scotland and Northern Ireland when the discretion of the procurator fiscal or coroner does not seem to have been exercised in the interests of further investigation. Nicholas Blake's proposal to bring the Royal Military Police under the scrutiny of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary would lead naturally to consideration of further issues, such as the provision of adequate resources and the benefits of a human rights training programme in terms of the effective conduct of investigations into sudden and suspicious deaths.

Will my hon. Friend therefore look into the manner in which non-combat deaths overseas are investigated? Will he consider meeting representatives of bereaved families to discuss their concerns and potential solutions? Many feel that the initial investigations, which sometimes took place some years ago, were totally inadequate.

How far can we go in improving the exercise of the duty of care? Nicholas Blake misses the opportunity to draw a line under the recruitment of under-18s, but he makes several useful recommendations to assist the Army in exercising its duty of care, and I hope that they will be accepted as soon as possible. The Army should promote understanding and respect for human rights at all ranks, and the fundamental principle of human rights should be part of basic training.

Let me mention some suggestions made by the families so that the Minister can consider them and reply in due course. First, there should be a mechanism to ensure parents' ongoing involvement in their children's welfare. Secondly, the Army should consider the means by which the Health and Safety Executive's jurisdiction can be extended to cover overseas bases and help protect against accidents. Thirdly, sustained action is needed to address the culture of alcohol abuse in the armed forces. Fourthly, attention needs to be given to shortcomings in the medical care regime and to its relationship with the chain of command, particularly where confidentiality issues arise. Fifthly, the Army should commission an independent study to monitor the experiences of soldiers who go absent without leave or who seek early discharge, with a view to publishing its findings and recommendations.

Can we safeguard children and young soldiers at risk? The closed nature of the military establishment, the strict disciplinary regime and the absence of parental oversight make young soldiers particularly vulnerable to the attention of sexual predators. Deepcut and Beyond families point to the conviction in August 2003 of a former lance corporal and serial abuser, Leslie Skinner, who was initially charged with male rape and later convicted of multiple charges of indecent assault. Those offences were committed while he was employed as a non-commissioned officer trainer at Deepcut barracks in 1996 and 1997.

Leslie Skinner's history is well known, and several hon. Members want to participate in the debate, so I shall not go into detail. I note, however, that the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill, currently under consideration in the House of Lords, provides for an effective checking and vetting regime that could result in practical mechanisms for barring individuals from contact with children. It gives substance to the Government's commitment to ensuring that children stay safe, which is one of the five thematic outcomes of "Every Child Matters". Although some recruits might fall outside the target group of children and young people aged between nought and 19, it is already recognised that the age range of the at-risk group might extend to 25 years where there are special or additional needs. Will the Minister take the opportunity presented by the Bill to ensure that young recruits are afforded further protection?

In a debate in the other place on 19 April, Lord Ashley of Stoke recalled that almost 20 years before, when the Army's reputation was threatened by brutality, bullying and vicious initiation rites, he had proposed that there should be an independent ombudsman. He recalled how he had argued on 2 November 1987 that that would be "the best way of transforming the Army ethos and of restoring its reputation."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 19 April 2006; Vol. 680, c. 1116.]

Lord Ashley explained that the then Minister had responded to such calls with the by now familiar message that bullying is a serious offence, that it forms no part of proper service life and that the Government are clear that it cannot be tolerated.

Surrey police, the Surrey coroner, Nicholas Blake and all who have had cause to look into the regime of "horrendous bullying", "foul abuse" and "sexual harassment" at Deepcut barracks have expressed shock that the situation was allowed to persist for so long. The warning bells have been sounded. Proposals have been made. Now is the time for action. The Armed Forces Bill provides a timely legislative opening to introduce a series of reforms demonstrating a commitment to change that will support the armed forces.

In spite of all the concerns that I have raised and those that I have read about, our armed forces do us proud. They go abroad in our defence and look after our interests. Now is the time for us to look after their interests as well.

Janet Anderson (in the Chair): Many hon. Members want to participate in this debate, and I shall try to call as many as possible but should like to start the wind-ups at about 3.30 pm.

2.51 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) on securing this debate. I also pay tribute to the parents of the four young recruits who died at Deepcut barracks. My comments will be expressly on the issues involving Deepcut, for those are the ones that I know best.

The Deepcut parents have been forced to fight a passionate and painful campaign to get answers to questions to which they have a fundamental right to have answers—namely, how and why their children died. From the start, the Deepcut parents have conducted themselves with enormous dignity and astonishing courage. I am sure that all hon. Members recognise that and pay their respects to them.

The publication of the Blake inquiry has been a long-awaited step in the long and slow march towards truth and disclosure. I have a strong view about where we are and what needs to happen next. The families need to be given due time to absorb the Blake report fully, and I am concerned that the Government have not yet done that. The parents remain grateful to Mr. Blake for his work in compiling his review, although they have reservations about some of his recommendations.

The families are disappointed at the Government's apparent insistence that the case is somehow now closed. They have been in that position before, having been told that everything had been done that could be done and that to keep on campaigning would be futile. However, the families have kept on, and have edged ever closer to what seems to be truth. In retrospect, it seems plausible to imagine that the Government decided beforehand that the Blake review would be their last action in relation to Deepcut.

My first question is therefore whether it is the Government's intention to regard the Blake inquiry as "case closed". If so, it would be a bad mistake both in the public interest, for many of the reasons that the hon. Lady highlighted, and out of respect for the wishes of the parents, who after all deserve breathing space as they seek to absorb such a massive report. Des James, my constituent and the father of Cheryl James, who died at Deepcut barracks, has wondered whether he made a mistake by acting in good faith and going along with the Blake inquiry. He feels that the Government are trying to foist closure on him and the other Deepcut parents before they have even had time to absorb the report fully and publish their own conclusions.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, had the care, communication and co-operation between different services that Mr. Blake outlines in his report been fully in place at the time when our constituents' children died at Deepcut, we would be in a better position now? Does he acknowledge that there has been any progress in the Army, particularly on the care and communication front?

Lembit Öpik: There has been progress, but that does not take away from the need to get an answer on what happened in the past. Every time I and other hon. Members who have been involved in the campaign have pushed the Government, more information has come out. That is one reason why I am concerned that we should not pretend that Mr. Blake's inquiry is an end to the matter.

On the same point, Mr. Blake extracted yet more detail about the deaths and the culture at Deepcut than the parents or Surrey police were aware of. He found "foul abuse of trainees", and evidence that sex had been used "as a passport". Bearing in mind the limited nature of Mr. Blake's investigation, it is possible—indeed, probable—that we still do not know the whole story.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): As someone who has read the entire report, does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be difficult now to find some of the evidence that might be needed, either because it has been destroyed or because some procedures in place at the time were, to say the least, lackadaisical? Trying to get to the truth of some of those deaths will be very difficult.

Lembit Öpik: I agree, but that is exactly why we need a full and independent public inquiry with the power legally to require witnesses to turn up. We are certainly not going to get the answers to which the hon. Gentleman refers if we adopt a voluntary, come-forward-if-you-dare process, which was more or less the constraint forced upon Mr. Blake.

The crucial point is that Mr. Blake did not have the power to compel witnesses to stand. With the Blake review, the families have had to accept that everyone who knew details or factors relating to the deaths stepped forward voluntarily. I do not believe that that was the case, however, and it is hardly surprising that the families remain cautious about the conclusions.

Before the Blake review, the families believed that a properly conducted public inquiry, with the power to compel witnesses to appear, was the only way of truly getting to the bottom of the Deepcut deaths. They continue to feel that way, so my second question is whether the Government are at least willing to hear representations from the parents about their views on the case for a public inquiry. It would be a cold-hearted Government indeed who were not willing to enter that dialogue.

The Ministry of Defence is adamant that the problems that affected Deepcut so severely are things of the past—that relates to what the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) said. However, according to the latest Army continuous attitude survey—the Army's own survey—8 per cent. of soldiers say that they have been bullied in the past 12 months; that is more than 7,000 personnel. Of those soldiers who complained about unfair treatment, discrimination, harassment or bullying, 77 per cent. were not satisfied with the way the complaint was handled.

Meg Hillier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Lembit Öpik: I would like to, but I know that the hon. Lady wishes to catch your eye, Mrs. Anderson, and I must be a little self-disciplined with my time keeping.

In his summation, Mr. Blake expressed the hope that the lessons of Deepcut could be learned. In light of that, I am joining the calls made by other hon. Members for the Government to move immediately to establish an armed forces ombudsman, as the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood suggested. My third question is, therefore, what the Minister's view is on that recommendation.

I stress that the families need time to absorb fully the contents of Mr. Blake's report. They should be given the space to take in the conclusions and recommendations. Then they will have the space and the time to make a formal response to the report. It is vital that the families receive as much information as possible about the deaths of their children. It is a scandal that the evidence given to the Devon and Cornwall constabulary in its review of Surrey police's activities has not been made available to the parents.

We should remember that the Devon and Cornwall investigation took two years. Surrey police had plenty of time to devise a satisfactory means of disclosure but failed to do so. As a result, the Deepcut parents have still not had access to the 150-page report, a full seven months after Devon and Cornwall constabulary published a three-page executive summary.

In my view there has been a deliberate culture of secrecy, with the parents being prevented from seeing that full report and the ludicrous referral of a member of the Surrey police authority, Mr. Terry Dicks, to the standards boards of England for daring to request a copy of the report. I note that the chair and the vice-chair of the authority, who have no more legal status than the authority, were given copies; that indicates that something has gone wrong with the process. My fourth question is whether the Minister will investigate the circumstances surrounding the withholding of that report and other supportive information. It was used by Mr. Blake, and it was used by Surrey police to produce a short summary, but it has not been shown to others, including the parents.

Finally, one of Mr. Blake's chief recommendations was that "agreement should be reached as to any further disclosure needed to enable the families of Sean Benton, Cheryl James and Geoff Gray to consider whether a fresh inquest into their respective child's death is in the interests of justice."

The Deepcut affair has exposed the secretive and opaque nature of police and military culture. The parents have had to fight every step of the way to get closer to the truth of what happened to their children. To regain the trust of the Deepcut families, and, significantly, of the public, the police need to operate in a more open and transparent manner. They should share, not block, access to information contained in the Devon and Cornwall police report.

I call on the Minister to work with his colleagues in the Home Office to ensure that the Devon and Cornwall police report is disclosed in full to the parents of those who died at Deepcut. Only when the parents have seen all the evidence can they decide how best to continue their campaign. As the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood pointed out, the coroner said that matters needed to be investigated thoroughly and independently and that the authorities should have nothing to fear from a full inquiry. The Minister should explain why the Government and the police are not taking that recommendation seriously.

I have not enjoyed pushing endlessly for the Government to take a more open and transparent approach towards the four tragic deaths at the Deepcut Army barracks. However, given the litany of failings exposed at each turn, I am more convinced than ever that it was right to do so. I do not enjoy the prospect of applying ever more pressure on the Government to get to the bottom of the unanswered questions and to get Ministers to share reports that have been kept secret until now, allegedly to protect individual identities, despite the fact that disclosure could easily have been arranged in a way that protected those identities.

In the interests of scotching further rumours that the official story has been covered up, and to ensure that everyone can have full faith in the investigations of Surrey police and others, I ask the Minister to assure the House that he will consider full disclosure of the reports. Either way, the Government can be assured that the issue will not go away until those questions are answered.

3.3 pm

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) for securing this debate, and for her tenacious campaigning on behalf of Deepcut and Beyond. I also pay tribute to Deepcut and Beyond; I have had the privilege of meeting the group on a number of occasions in my role as a member of the Select Committee on Defence and, more recently, as a member of the Committee considering the Armed Forces Bill. That determined group of individuals has done a great public service by exposing some of the most horrendous cases of bullying and by asking questions on matters that have been covered up by the military for far too long.

I support the armed forces not least because many young recruits come from my constituency and the north-east—and they are proud to serve in the armed forces. However, I am not proud of the way in which some people have been treated in the armed forces. The Deepcut and Beyond group of families has exposed some problems, and not only at Deepcut; as my hon. Friend said, Mrs. Farr and others are continuing their work by helping new recruits at Catterick.

In the last Parliament, I had the privilege of being a member of the Defence Committee when it considered the duty of care that the three armed forces have for youngsters in their charge. The inquiry lasted a year and took evidence not only from families but from the three armed forces. The Committee's report is a definitive work on the way in which such youngsters are looked after. As an historic reference, some past practices were appalling. The Committee heard not only how the Deepcut families were treated but shocking evidence of how others had been treated and how they were dealt with afterwards. There has been an improvement in the way in which the armed forces handle things—for instance, in what they should do if people die while in the forces.

Recently, I moved new clause 24 to the Armed Forces Bill, in which I called for an independent commissioner to oversee complaints against the armed forces. Without such a commissioner, the reputation of the armed forces, which has been damaged, will continue to fall. The Bill gives us the opportunity to put matters right. I withdrew the new clause because the Blake report was due to be published the following afternoon, and I did not want to pre-empt it. I was assured by the Minister that the Government would consider those issues as the Bill went through Parliament and in their response to the Blake report.

Meg Hillier: I agree that appointing an armed forces ombudsman would be a good move. Does my hon. Friend not also agree that such a person's remit should require local police forces to provide for disclosure? Today, I received a letter from the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety saying that it was entirely a matter for Surrey police whether to disclose all the evidence to Mr. and Mrs. Gray in my constituency and to the other families of those who have died.

Mr. Jones: That is an important point. It is not only the armed forces that have no credit as a result of Deepcut; neither do the police.

I welcome the fact that a new protocol allows the police to have primacy in investigating such deaths. That is an important move. Part of the problem with Deepcut was the initial investigation into the four deaths. When the families subsequently asked quite reasonable questions, they were blocked. That led to an air of suspicion. If I was in their position, I would have come to the same conclusion that they did.

I have read the Blake report, and it is a good piece of work. My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood knows that I do not support another inquiry into the Deepcut deaths. The Blake report exposed the details of four very different cases. We should grasp its recommendations, especially that on independent oversight. Putting in place an independent commissioner or ombudsman would be a monument to the campaigning work of Deepcut and Beyond, and a fitting tribute to the four who died.

One issue that has not received much attention is the role of the media. Blake is critical of how the media reported the deaths, especially in the early stages. It is sad that certain newspapers have not held up their hands and come clean, admitting that they made mistakes. Those mistakes not only led to confusion but hurt the families of those who died. To be fair, Blake pulls no punches in his criticism of one national newspaper.

The British armed forces have the opportunity to regain their reputation. People should not be afraid. Other armed forces around the world, forces with which our armed forces regularly train and go to war, have independent oversight. Such oversight would ensure confidence among the young men and women who join the armed forces, and their families, that problems and complaints will be independently investigated. That will improve the situation.

The same arguments were put forward several years ago before we had the independent police complaints commission. Speak now to any chief constable, and they will say that it has improved the way they operate; it has not been a hindrance but has improved how they investigate and treat their recruits, and how they interact with the public.

Finally, I turn to the evidence given to the Armed Forces Bill Committee by the Deepcut and Beyond families. It headed its evidence "openness and transparency". That is what is needed in the British armed forces today. If during the passage of the Armed Forces Bill an ombudsman or commissioner is put in place, along with openness and transparency in respect of all information, that will go a long way towards satisfying some of the calls that there have rightly been, and it will be a fitting tribute to the sterling campaigning work of the Deepcut and Beyond families.

3.10 pm

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mrs. Anderson. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) for securing the debate and for diligently looking after her fellow members of the all-party group on army deaths. Kevin McNamara is a hard act to follow, but she has done it admirably and I hope the group will go from strength to strength.

Because of my constituency interests, I will confine my remarks to events at Deepcut barracks. I have been the constituency MP for Jim and Yvonne Collinson for the past year and have solidly backed them, and all the other families involved, in their campaign to secure a full judicial public inquiry into why their son, James, died.

Like all the families involved in the Deepcut campaign, Jim and Yvonne Collinson want only one thing: to find out how and why their son died. Like all the families involved in the campaign, they want, as far as is humanly possible after the tragic loss of a teenage son, to move on so that they can get their lives back together; they want some sort of closure so that they can start to live the rest of their lives. Jim and Yvonne have endured much over the past few years, and in recent months their lives have been a rollercoaster; first, there was the public inquest into the death of their son James at a Surrey court, and then a few weeks ago the Blake report was published.

I attended some of the inquiry hearings, and I found them fascinating. I know that "fascinating" is not a word that Jim and Yvonne would use to describe how they felt; they had to endure details about the conditions and situations that led to their son's tragic death. However, it was a fascinating inquiry; it was a very robust and thorough examination of the circumstances surrounding James Collinson's death.

The families are the biggest stakeholders in this process, and I have spoken to Jim and Yvonne about that. It is for them that we take this issue forward, and in order to help them secure justice, we continue to call for a public inquiry, which would eventually get to the heart of the matter of how their children so tragically died.

[Pete Wishart]

However, we seem to be further than ever from securing a judicial public inquiry. Following the Blake report, the Government appear to have started to dig their heels in. Ministers have suggested that it is now time to move on, and that we should leave the sorry chapter of what happened at the Deepcut barracks behind us. That is a hopeless and pious wish. How can we possibly move on when there is still a huge question mark hanging over the deaths of four young people? This issue will not go away until we finally find out what happened at Deepcut barracks that led to three young men and one young woman taking their lives. These tragic events are too serious to move on from. The campaign for a full judicial public inquiry will continue.

The public inquest into James Collinson's death was significant. It was the first of four inquests held in public in front of a coroner. A jury was given the opportunity to give a verdict, and there was opportunity for counsel to cross-examine. It was a robust and thorough hearing, and we learned more and more about what happened at Deepcut barracks. However, like everything else in the history of Deepcut—like all the other 17 or so reports, investigations and inquiries looking into Deepcut—it was essentially flawed and ultimately unsatisfactory. Like all the previous inquiries, it could go so far but it could not tell us everything. The public inquest into the death of James Collinson was hampered by the fact that it had solely and exclusively to focus on the death of James Collinson. Therefore, we lost the interconnectedness with all the other deaths at Deepcut. It was as if we were examining James Collinson's death without a context. In that way, it was totally unsatisfactory in trying to find out conclusively what happened at Deepcut.

There was a lot of new evidence about what happened. We learned more about the culture of the place; we heard allegations of bullying, and of the almost incompetent negligence that led to four teenagers handling lethal weapons, which, it was suggested, ultimately took their lives. We heard more about difficulties in the police investigations, such as the unsatisfactory manner of Surrey police's initial investigations, and the almost negligent way that some of the autopsies were carried out. However, because of the limitations of its terms of reference, the inquiry was just another milestone in respect of Deepcut. It was no more than that; it could not tell us everything.

In common with the inquests into the other deaths, an open verdict was recorded. The jury returned that verdict. Suicide was once again ruled out, and the open verdict suggested that there is still a lot more to learn about the death of James Collinson. Hope was given to all of us who have been campaigning for a full judicial and public inquiry when the coroner, Michael Burgess, suggested that we should have such an inquiry. He gave the strongest possible suggestion that a public inquiry would be not only in the families' interests but in the interests of the Ministry of Defence and the public. It is worth reminding ourselves of what he said:

"the MoD should take whatever steps are necessary to restore public confidence in the recruitment and training of young soldiers whether at Deepcut or elsewhere. I personally believe that they should have nothing to fear from an inquiry held in public ... where the various issues outside the direct causation of the deaths of James and others can be explored in greater depth. I personally believe that they should have nothing to fear from an inquiry held in public ... where the various issues (outside the direct causation of the deaths of James and others) can be explored in greater depth".

I had a little exchange with the Secretary of State about what the coroner meant by those remarks. It is clear to me that he is saying that it would be in the MOD's interests to have a full public inquiry. I know, because it was said to Yvonne Collinson, that that is the coroner's view. It could be supported by Surrey police if officers were asked about a conversation they had at the time of that inquest.

No sooner had the public inquest concluded than we had the Nicholas Blake report. Like everybody else, I believe that Nicholas Blake went about his business assiduously; the report is a diligent, professional piece of work that was robust and extensive. I see the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) has a copy of it—all 400 pages of it. Nicholas Blake did his work well. He painted in a few pictures about what happened at Deepcut barracks; the report detailed some of the bullying that took place, and there were serious new allegations about sexual harassment. It told us a lot, but it could not tell us everything. It was like the 17 or so earlier reports in that it went so far into telling us what happened at Deepcut but could not tell us everything.

The Blake report was hampered by the fact that it was entirely voluntary. He could not subpoena anyone to give evidence. There was no opportunity for anybody to cross-examine anything said. There was no jury; there was just Nicholas Blake and whoever he was taking evidence from. In that respect, it was ultimately flawed in its terms of reference and what it could do.

The headline of the Blake report was his conclusion that no public inquiry was required, and his assertion that those young people were bullied to death. However, although he was good at detailing how these young people came to their deaths, he could not satisfactorily explain why they took their lives, and, looking at the evidence, it is hard to decide that.

Meg Hillier: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, from conversations I have had with families, it is clear that sometimes we will never know what happened to their children. That is a hard fact that we may have to face. Does the hon. Gentleman think a public inquiry at this distance in time could achieve all that he is claiming it could achieve?

Pete Wishart: Of course the hon. Lady is right. The Blake report goes so far in revealing what happened, but it could not do everything. However, a public inquiry could. I believe a public inquiry is the best, most effective tool to determine and understand what happened at Deepcut barracks. I hope that the campaign for one continues.

What was most intriguing about the Blake report was the Government's response. As I have said, they have suggested that we move on. I think it was the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, who, surprisingly, is not present today, who said that the families should have no veto on this issue. I think the families are the most important stakeholders, and their views should be paramount in respect of how we take the issue forward. I hope that the Under-Secretary who is present does not share his colleague's view; I would like to hear his view on that.

There were good recommendations in the Blake report, and I heard Blake say in the media that if all his recommendations were not implemented in full, he would back the call for a public inquiry. That is a challenge to Government to make sure that all the important recommendations, including the key one about an ombudsman, are implemented in full.

We would all agree—including the families, the Ministry of Defence and those with an interest in military issues—that we want an end to this affair. I am relatively new to the subject—I took over as Yvonne and Jim Collinson's MP at the last general election, so I have been dealing with the subject for a year—but there will be a stage when we start to put the matter behind us. In response to the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier), the best way to get a conclusion on the subject would be to have that full, public inquiry. The shadow cast by Deepcut will remain until the matter of the deaths is finally dealt with. The campaign for a full public inquiry is as strong as ever, and the furore surrounding Deepcut will not end until that public inquiry is granted.

3.20 pm

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): Thank you for allowing me to take part in this debate, Mrs. Anderson. I would like to make representations on behalf of Norma Langford, whose son Corporal Ian Holt died in Belize on non-combat duty. She gave evidence on duty of care to the Select Committee on Defence, and I am told by people who were there that she was extremely good and very eloquent. She is a doughty campaigner, and she comes to my surgeries frequently to keep me up to date on what has happened and where the campaign is at. She wrote to me recently to say:

"Many overseas deaths have not been investigated properly; QC Blake's Deepcut Review supports this in paragraph 12.30 where he points out 'Where the Royal Military Police ... has primacy for an investigation, the quality of the investigation may vary according to resources, training and the context of the investigation.'

Many families have records showing the inadequacy of an investigation that has taken place overseas with only SIB/RMP"— that is, the special investigation branch and the Royal Military Police—

"investigating the death, and even if there have been civilian police involved families do not have access to their records.

These families feel their only hope of having the deaths investigated adequately and learning the true facts of how their family member died is to have a public inquiry."

Although she says "public inquiry", I am aware that she would be happy with what could be described as a thorough investigation. She ends:

"These soldiers served their country at home and abroad, my son served nine years with the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers. Surely it is time for the Ministry of Defence to grace their deaths with a full and thorough investigation."

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the issues raised by Mrs. Langford and others is the fact that families are not allowed to attend Army inquests? That leads to the idea that there is something to cover up. My hon. Friend may like to know that the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill recommends that the family be allowed to attend as a matter of course. Does he think that that would help, at least in allowing people to get the facts at an early stage?

Jim Dobbin: Yes, I entirely agree, because many people concerned feel that things have been covered up. More openness and transparency in the system would go a long way towards convincing them that everybody was doing their bit.

My question on behalf of Norma is as follows: the Minister has stated that there will not be a public inquiry into non-combat deaths, so will the Ministry of Defence afford new investigations to families that have not had an adequate investigation, or perhaps an independent review into the deaths of their loved ones? The Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill, of which my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) is a member, suggested an independent commissioner, and that is probably the way ahead.

3.24 pm

Willie Rennie (Dunfermline and West Fife) (LD): Thank you for allowing me to contribute to this debate, Mrs. Anderson. I congratulate the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) on securing it, and on the way in which she presented her case. It has been a thoughtful and interesting debate.

Families put their trust in the Army to care for their children, and, as we know, in many cases soldiers are children. Many are plucked straight from school, from which they could return to the comfort of their homes every night. The change is a shock in itself. The new regime can be trying to even the most hardened. We all appreciate that serving in our armed forces is no picnic. Preparing for the brutalities of war requires endeavour, grit and talent. Young men and women return from the Army, having left only a few months earlier as boys and girls.

According to Amnesty International, between 1990 and 2003 some 1,748 members of the UK armed forces lost their lives through non-natural causes in or around barracks. Of those, 200 deaths were self-inflicted. Between 1984 and 2005, some 638 suicides occurred amongst members of the UK regular armed forces. Overall, the male suicide rates in the UK armed forces were statistically lower than in the general UK population. The exception was among Army males aged under 20, who had an increased risk of about 50 per cent.

Often, we can only speculate on the reasons for each of those deaths, but perhaps there are a few indicators. Last year's Army continuous attitude survey found that two out of three soldiers do not feel valued by the Army, and one in four say that their morale is low or very low. Over half of all soldiers are not satisfied with their accommodation, and 44 per cent. say that Army life is worse or much worse than they expected. A staggering 8 per cent. of soldiers say that they have been bullied in the past 12 months. That equates to more than 7,000 personnel. Crucially, of those soldiers who complained about unfair treatment, discrimination, harassment or bullying in the past 12 months, 77 per cent. were not satisfied with how the complaint was handled.

The deaths at Deepcut have sent shockwaves throughout the armed forces, the Ministry of Defence, the Government and indeed this House. As we know, the Blake report made 34 important recommendations and suggested that there were systemic failings. I will list five of those failings: there was poor appreciation of the needs of recruits under the age of 18; there were poor supervision levels, often as low as 1:60; there was bullying; there were high levels of dissatisfaction and extremely low morale; and, finally, there were poor grievance procedures.

So what should our response be? The Liberal Democrats have welcomed the Blake report and call for full and rapid implementation of its recommendations. There are 34 serious recommendations that require a serious and prompt response. When will we hear a full report in response? I was pleased to read that Lord Drayson has given a commitment to reporting back quickly. He said that would happen "within months". Well, one of those months has already passed. I would welcome an indication of how that consideration is progressing, and roughly when we can expect a full response.

The Liberal Democrats agree that a public inquiry is not necessary provided that the families have access to all the reports and evidence. In recommendation 3, Blake examines whether it is right for the UK to be one of the few countries that recruits child soldiers—that is, those under 18. We have had international criticism for that policy. The review says that recruiting needs are not a satisfactory justification, but goes on to say that the policy is justified given the inadequacies of education and training in the UK's civilian system. The report says that although the education benefits outweigh the downside of having child soldiers, a number of special safeguards are required. The first is the separation of 16 year-olds; the second is a right to resign for those still in training, even those who have passed their 18th birthday; the third and most important is that no posting to the field Army should occur before the age of 18. Do the Government intend to implement those immediately?

Mr. Kevan Jones: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman saying what the Liberal Democrats want to put forward, but there were two occasions on which they could have influenced the matter. First, when the Select Committee put together its report, the Liberal Democrat Member very rarely attended. The second and most recent occasion was when we considered the Armed Forces Bill. The Liberal Democrat Front Bencher rarely attended that, too, and did not put forward any recommendations, but the hon. Gentleman is now saying what the Government should do. Will he tell me why they missed those opportunities?

Willie Rennie: I appreciate that we have made errors in this regard, but we are confident that they will not happen again. I cannot explain what happened on those occasions, but we understand that we have made errors. However, we must not get away from the point.

We must improve living conditions for soldiers by providing better accommodation, washing facilities and so on. Will the poor-quality accommodation, identified as a factor, be upgraded?

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that when we quote statistics we have to be careful to reflect the trend? The trend of Army soldier satisfaction with accommodation is most definitely one of improvement; there is much higher satisfaction now than there was in 1997, when this Government took over.

Willie Rennie: I am sure that the trend is going in the right direction, but we cannot get away from the fact that just last year, the survey found that soldiers were dissatisfied with their accommodation. Any improvement from a low threshold does not change the fact that one started with a low threshold, and we are required to take action.

Mrs. Humble: Before the hon. Gentleman moves on from accommodation, was he as shocked as I was to read what was said in the Blake report about the way in which the male and female accommodation was not segregated, which led to some more-than-unfortunate incidents? Does he agree that when considering accommodation, we have to consider the safety and security of new female recruits to the Army?

Willie Rennie: I agree. That finding of the report is completely unsatisfactory and action is required in that area.

Liberal Democrats also want to improve supervision levels so that vulnerable young people can be monitored and supported effectively. We support the setting up of an independent complaints commission for the armed forces. Recommendation 26 calls for the establishment of a commissioner of military complaints—an armed forces ombudsman for all the armed forces, not just for trainees.

The Armed Forces Bill has a watered-down proposal for an independent element in redress procedures. The Blake review has a much more useful recommendation, which would address growing concern among the armed forces that their views on their conditions are just ignored. I suggest to the Minister that this is the opportunity to take an imaginative approach. Will he undertake to implement recommendation 24, which states that the Royal Military Police should be brought formally under Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary?

Will measures to vet and train instructors be implemented, for the protection of young people? A number of important recommendations could be implemented by the Ministry of Defence now, and we are pressing for early implementation. If the recommendations of the report are fully implemented, closure may be achieved. If any good is to come from the terrible, tragic events at Deepcut, the MOD needs either to respond and transfer all resources necessary to make its under-18 training regime safe, or to consider whether it can continue to recruit such young people into the Army.

3.33 pm

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): This is the first time I have had the pleasure of serving under your chairmanship, Mrs. Anderson. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) on securing the debate and on the work she does as chairman of the all-party group, the work of which I know hon. Members support.

The hon. Lady and others have understandably focused on the investigation stage of the process and what has happened since the deaths, but I shall focus on some issues raised in the Blake review, which others have mentioned, concerning events leading up to the deaths. In other words, what could the Ministry of Defence do better to avoid deaths in the first place, thus avoiding going through the investigation process?

As many hon. Members have done, I pay tribute on behalf of the Opposition to all members of our armed forces who serve their country with distinction, and to their families, who provide a great deal of support for that service. In return, we owe them a thorough debate and a thorough consideration of the Blake recommendations to ensure that they have the very best possible conditions of service.

It is worth saying that the Ministry of Defence and the armed forces face a considerable challenge. As has been said, the armed forces recruit people who are sometimes from very challenging backgrounds, many of whom are under 18, and the forces have to turn them into professional soldiers. That requires a robust training regime. A regime that was not robust would not do proper service to those young people because it would subject them to difficult and challenging conditions without the proper training and without equipping them to deal with what are often life-threatening situations. A difficult balance must be undertaken. There must be a tough and robust training regime to ensure that those young people are ready for combat, but we must also ensure that the duty of care is properly fulfilled. The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) drew attention to the thorough report that the Select Committee on Defence produced on the duty of care, which thoroughly considered these issues.

The Opposition support the continuation of recruitment of those who are under 18: they make a tremendous contribution to the armed forces. The Blake report said that a number of things could be done prior to recruitment as part of the recruitment process, and I should be interested to hear the Minister's comments. In at least two of the Deepcut cases, there was a known—though not known to the Army—history of self-harm. Will the Minister comment on what progress has been made on improving the knowledge that the Army has of the medical histories of recruits? To what extent can that knowledge be better taken into account when people are recruited, either to make appropriate decisions about recruitment, or, just as importantly, if recruits are at risk and are still thought right for the armed forces, to ensure that they are given appropriate care during their training and service?

Lembit Öpik: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but does he accept that self-harm is quite prevalent among young people in this country? The issue for those of us who have campaigned about the Deepcut Army barracks does not relate to the individual problems of a particular recruit, but to the fact that there still seems to be secrecy surrounding the facts relating to the four deaths that took place there. In our judgment at least, a degree of cover-up of the facts is still involved.

Mr. Harper: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I shall come in a few moments to some of the points about the family's view of the investigations.

The other element of the training and supervisory regime to which attention has been drawn was the proper ratio between trainees and those in charge of their supervision. Blake notes that that ratio was at times only 1:60. In 2004, the then Secretary of State for Defence said that a target of 1:38 was being achieved. It would be helpful if the Minister told us whether that ratio is being achieved. Is it being achieved at all locations, through the day and night? If we have not yet achieved it, what progress is being made towards attaining it?

Regarding the investigations, however well we improve and implement recruitment and training, and whatever the level of supervision, it is inevitable that there will be deaths in Army barracks in future. Some will be accidental and some will not. When they occur, we need to ensure that the right processes are in place, so that families feel that their concerns are being addressed and the investigatory process is as open as possible.

Comments have been made about who has primacy in an investigation. Blake drew attention to that, and a protocol was signed on 7 November that made the position clear. However, given that there were already protocols in place that did not seem to be well understood by at least some police forces, it would be helpful to know what follow-up work is taking place to ensure that the protocol of 7 November is well understood in the armed forces and constabularies throughout the country. We must ensure that such information is properly communicated and well understood. If any such tragedies occur in future, that protocol should be in place right from the beginning.

During any future investigation, the most important thing will be that families are kept fully informed and there must be transparency and openness. If that does not take place from the beginning and is neglected, as it was at Deepcut, families will suspect that there is something they are not being told and that there is a cover-up. I suspect that once they have that impression, nothing that can be done in the case of their loved ones can ever completely remove that sense of suspicion. I suspect that that is the situation now. I am not sure that anything can be done to satisfy completely the families of the four soldiers who lost their lives at Deepcut—a point to which one or two Members have alluded.

In his statement about the Deepcut review, the Minister of State for the Armed Forces said that the Armed Forces Bill would provide the opportunity to implement a number of those changes.

Lembit Öpik: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Harper: I am reluctant to give way, because I want to give time to the Minister to answer all queries, if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me.

In the other place on 19 April, Lord Drayson made a specific commitment. He said that the Government expected to be able to respond to all the recommendations from the Blake report within two months. As the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie) said, we are halfway through that process. It would be helpful if the Minister did not go through each recommendation in detail but gave us some idea about the progress that the Ministry of Defence has made and about whether we are on track to hear its full response to those 34 recommendations, as Lord Drayson said, by the end of May.

[Mr. Harper]

The Armed Forces Bill is a vehicle to implement some of those changes. I understand that it will be back before the House in the week commencing 22 May, which is only a couple of weeks away. That does not give the Ministry of Defence very long to publish any amendments to the legislation, so that Members may have a proper opportunity to study them. I should be grateful if the Minister outlined the Ministry of Defence's thinking about whether it will hit that timetable, and when in good time it intends to publish any amendments, so that the debate can take place.

One thing that came out of studying the documents was that there has been a significant number of reports and investigations. A number of Members have today repeated the call for a public inquiry, and it is worth restating the Opposition's position, which my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) laid out in response to the statement from the Minister of State.

There are those who believe that a public inquiry is essential for restoring public confidence in the Army. I do not think that there is a general lack of confidence in the British Army. There may be specific anxieties, but I do not believe that a public inquiry would deal with them, nor, in particular, with some of the media reporting that would inevitably attend it. An inquiry would be a vehicle for ill-informed speculation that could make the situation worse. Given that some of the investigations were poorly handled in the first place, and given the suspicion at the beginning of the process, from the families' point of view, they may always quite understandably have a nagging suspicion that there is something that they have not been told. I am not convinced that a public inquiry would address that issue.

Mrs. Humble: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Harper: If the hon. Lady will forgive me, I shall not, in order to allow the Minister time to respond.

The Blake report into Deepcut should not be the end of the process. The end should be the Government's thorough implementation of the appropriate recommendations. A constant theme throughout the process has been the significant number of reports, and the Surrey police report stated that "the army has consistently identified issues of concern, but practical implementation of risk reduction measures has often not followed."

The finest tribute we can pay to those who have died is to ensure that the correct measures are put in place and action taken. We need to put in place systems that will address those problems, so that we never again have to debate the deaths of some very fine young people within our Army training establishments.

3.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) on securing this timely debate. She has been hard-working and assiduous in these matters for several years. I can testify that she has been hard-working and diligent from the number of questions that she has put to me. The whole House owes her a debt for the work that she has done. I acknowledge the many contributions that have been made during this important and wide-ranging debate and shall do my best to respond to as many as I can.

I extend my sincere condolences to the families who have mourned that untimely loss of loved ones. I am sure that the expressions made by colleagues this afternoon underpin that. As I have emphasised to the House on many occasions, we take seriously our responsibility to ensure the well-being and safety of all our personnel. Each and every death is a tragedy in its own right. We must ensure that we learn the lessons from those tragic cases and do everything we can to ensure that such incidents do not happen again.

There are approximately 190,000 people in our armed forces. Almost 102,000 are regular and full-time reserve members of the Army. Last year, almost 8,000 recruits passed through training to join the field Army. The vast majority will go on to enjoy rewarding and challenging careers in our services. They will eventually leave the Army equipped with a range of skills and experiences often far beyond their expectations when they signed up.

The Army is extraordinarily successful at taking young people from all walks of life and backgrounds and quickly turning them into soldiers, positive role models and good citizens. The high-quality training that those young men and women receive delivers outstanding results, from war fighting, through peace-support and counter-terrorist operations, to a range of roles supporting the UK civilian community.

That training bears fruit time and again in theatres of operation throughout a turbulent world: Iraq, Afghanistan, Sierra Leone and the Balkans are all recent examples. But we must not and cannot be complacent. Many comments in today's discussion have focused on the review conducted by Nicholas Blake QC, which considered the circumstances surrounding the deaths of four young soldiers at Deepcut. The report concluded that although the Army did not cause any of the deaths, there were worrying failures to identify and address sources of risk. Importantly, Mr. Blake concluded that there was no evidence to suggest that bullying caused the deaths of those reviewed. However, he raised some important questions about the nature of the training environment at that time.

We take those findings seriously. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the armed forces, who is, incidentally, in the Falkland Islands, made clear our response in his statement to the House on 29 March. We are committed to a process of continuous improvement. The Deepcut review will add momentum to our programme of change. We fully acknowledge the weaknesses that the report identified, and appreciate the urgency required in putting them right.

Several hon. Members have raised the need for a public inquiry into the deaths at Deepcut. The Deepcut review concluded that on the basis of current evidence, a public inquiry is not necessary. We share that view and, given the extensive investigations that have taken place, agree with the conclusion that nothing would be gained from a public inquiry. Considering the Deepcut review as a whole, the important thing is to learn the lessons, to continue to move forward and to provide the best possible welfare support for our young trainees.

Nicholas Blake's report raised the issue of a military complaints commissioner, and it has been referred to today. We have been considering for some time how we can best ensure that our personnel have the confidence to raise a grievance and the assurance that their grievance will be dealt with quickly, effectively and fairly. Our underlying aim is for a complaints system that is right for the way in which our armed forces operate. The system must be fair, transparent, effective and prompt. It must more than anything be a system in which all service personnel have complete confidence. I am sure that everyone present shares that view.

To that end, in the Committee on the Armed Forces Bill we proposed improvements to our complaints system. I have no doubt that we will return to them on Report and Third Reading later this month. We are considering in detail Mr. Blake's recommendations about the complaints process. His proposal to establish a commissioner of military complaints will be rightly and properly considered under the auspices of the Bill. If colleagues will forgive me, I do not want to go any further down that track, because we will come to it on Report and Third Reading.

I turn to the matter of family attendance at boards of inquiry, which currently are not open to members of the public or press, or to family members unless they are called as witnesses. As I said in Committee, there are two main reasons why families are not usually allowed to attend service inquiries. The first is that we think that having members of the public and family members at inquiries could inhibit witnesses from giving full and frank evidence. The second is that boards of inquiry could convene and adjourn several times over a number of months, possibly in different parts of the world. Ultimately, our concern is that the attendance of families at inquiries might prevent boards of inquiry from achieving their primary aims, which are to learn lessons and prevent similar incidents.

I reiterate a point that I made in Committee: a board of inquiry is not an inquest and cannot serve the same purpose as an inquest. Mr. Blake made specific recommendations concerning boards of inquiry, which we will examine carefully. I assure the House that we are considering in detail all the recommendations in the review, some of which are challenging and require significant consideration. As that work is ongoing, colleagues will understand that there is a limit to what I can say until we have carefully considered the review in its entirety. However, I am determined to see how Mr. Blake's recommendations can best be implemented without reducing the effectiveness of our necessarily robust and challenging military training environment. As soon as we are in a position to do so, we will publish in full our formal response to the Deepcut review.

Mr. Harper: Lord Drayson gave a commitment regarding the timetable of that response being within two months of Mr. Blake's inquiry being published. Is that still the Ministry of Defence's intention?

Mr. Touhig: That is certainly our ambition. The Armed Forces Bill is returning to the House and if there are to be any amendments, we need to deal with them as soon as possible. That is what we are currently working to.

Recently, a number of hon. Members have raised concerns about bullying and harassment in the Army, particularly regarding the troubling perception that there is a possible link between bullying and the number of non-combat deaths in the armed forces. Incidents of bullying, harassment and other inappropriate behaviour exist in society as a whole and can never be completely eliminated, but it is essential that we should do all we can to establish an environment in which they are deemed absolutely unacceptable.

Bullying is insidious, corrosive and totally against the principle of self-discipline and the concept of teamwork at the core of our armed forces. Soldiers are often asked to operate in a harsh environment, and training has to prepare them for that, but there is a distinct, although sometimes fine, line between a robust approach to training and to discipline and bullying. No one should be in any doubt which side of the line we expect our soldiers to tread. At every stage of their training and careers it is made clear to them all that bullying and harassment, in any form, are not tolerated. All recruits and trainees are offered clear guidance on the relevant processes so that any allegations of such unacceptable conduct can be investigated thoroughly and dealt with appropriately.

It is a sad and unfortunate fact in our armed forces, and in our wider society, that they will never be able to eradicate the tragic incidence of suicide. We can, however, by careful management, pragmatic policies, better understanding, and improved knowledge and education reduce the risks. The Army has updated its guidance and procedures on the prevention and management of suicide and self-harm. An Army suicide vulnerability risk management policy has also recently been introduced. It provides detailed and mandatory guidance to those in the chain of command about how to identify those at risk and how to manage and care for them proactively.

Work on suicide risk management is continuing on a tri-service basis in relation to prevention, screening, reporting, data collection, training and education. In the past 18 months, multi-disciplinary service and civilian groups have been set up to promote good practice and mental well-being across the armed forces. We are continually working to improve the support available to individuals, especially through accessible, professional welfare services operating to common defence standards.

More generally, we are committed to the well-being and safety of all our personnel. That is a fundamental responsibility for individuals throughout the chain of command from the moment they join the armed forces. In the early days of an individual's career, we recognise the vital role of our instructors at service training establishments. We already have work in hand to improve the training provided to them through the development of the "train the trainer" programme.

Support to personnel is provided in the first instance by the military staff of the recruits' training teams. In addition, every unit has a comprehensive welfare system which is widely publicised. There is a network of agencies including chaplains, WRVS volunteers, and unit welfare officers. Personnel also have access to single service confidential helplines and the Samaritans helpline, so a range of measures are in place.

I shall address some of the points raised by my colleagues. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood, who initiated the debate, and tell her that we continue to improve our complaints procedure, which we will make more robust. She was, perhaps, a little unfair to the Royal Military Police, who execute their duties professionally. No system is perfect, and there are glitches and difficulties from time to time, but on the whole they do a good job.

I will study points one to five that my hon. Friend made and, if it helps, will willingly invite her to meet me and discuss them in detail. Perhaps we can work together to take forward her hopes and aspirations in relation to this matter.

My hon. Friend also asked about the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill. I have written to my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills indicating that we completely support the Bill. When it is enacted, it will help us with our military training.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) spoke passionately about the families whom he has been supporting. I do not think that we have ever said that there is closure on this matter. We will respond to Blake, and judgments will have to be made on whether anything further can or should be done.

I pay tribute to the important comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). He also made some excellent comments in our debates on the Armed Forces Bill, and we have benefited from his help and advice.

The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) raised some issues. I certainly understand the Collinson family's desire for closure. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) said, even a public inquiry might not tell people exactly how their children died. If it were in my power to do that, I would, but I am not certain that it is achievable.

I recently wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) and followed up my correspondence yesterday in further discussions with him.

The hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) raised a number of points on behalf of the Opposition, to which I shall respond in writing if he will permit me, as I need to study some of them further. I certainly hope that we can complete our deliberations as far as Blake is concerned. If we do not manage to table amendments before the Bill is reported on 22 May, we will do so in the other place and bring the Bill back in the normal way.

We at the Ministry of Defence are not simply Ministers, officials, and members of the armed forces. We are also fathers, mothers, and people with families. We intuitively understand how important it is that young people are looked after and valued, and we feel passionately about the care that we provide to them. We are acutely aware of the sensitivity of the issues raised today and of the need for us urgently to address areas of weakness.

We deeply regret the death of anyone in our charge. Each family has suffered a great loss and understandably still carries a burden. No matter what is said today by me or anyone else in this House, those families will continue to have that pain and suffering for the rest of their lives. I fear that there is nothing we can do to mitigate that. I certainly share with them in that respect. I know that there is nothing that we can do to restore their loved ones to them, but we can continue to improve how we care for those who are in our charge.

I have on my desk a mission statement, which simply says: "We value our servicemen and women and their families and will do everything in our power to demonstrate that." It is the first thing that I see every morning when I walk into my office. That is why I am a Minister, and why I want to do something about the issues raised here today. Working in partnership, my colleagues and I can do something to try to ensure that the tragedies that we have talked about today—whatever their causes—may not be repeated.

Advice/Legal Services (Hull)

4 pm

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I have a cold and hay fever, so I apologise for my voice, Mrs. Anderson.

I am pleased to have secured this debate, and I am very pleased indeed that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister will respond on behalf of the Government, as I know that she has a personal commitment to good legal advice services across the whole of the United Kingdom. Before I entered the House of Commons, I worked in a law centre for many years and in the field of social welfare law. I believe that my right hon. and learned Friend worked in a law centre in north London a few years ago, so perhaps she will be able to identify with some of the comments that I shall make about law centres.

I believe that all Members agree that access to good quality advice and legal representation when people need it is vital. I want to use my time this afternoon to say a little about the community legal service, which has been an enormous success overall and a real tribute to the Government's commitment to legal advice in this country. I also want to say something about the particular circumstances of Hull and, finally, the specific problems in respect of legal representation in Hull.

The Access to Justice Act 1999 set up the Legal Services Commission and, out of that, the community legal service, which is a flagship policy for the Labour Government. It is absolutely right that the aims and objectives of the community legal service are at the centre of the Legal Services Commission. The community legal service is the framework for a comprehensive local network of good quality legal and advice services that are supported by co-ordinated funding and based on the needs of local people. By working together, the Legal Services Commission, local authorities and other agencies and funders can make the most effective use of resources, which we all know are limited, to fund services that really meet the needs of local communities, be it through private practice solicitors, advice agencies or law centres.

The regional Legal Services Commission spent a great deal of time planning and mapping services in the different areas of the country to identify what already existed and what needed to be put in place, and I fully support the work that it did. I was still working as a lawyer in Paddington when the regional Legal Services Commission identified the needs in west London, and it was a breath of fresh air to sit down with other agencies to look at the services that were being provided and where the gaps were.

Having discussed the importance of the community legal service and recognised its potential, I want to say something about Hull, which is a city that is often overlooked. It has high levels of deprivation—it is ninth in the deprivation statistics for 354 local authority areas and districts—and there is poor health, low educational achievement and a low skill base in the general population. To add to its problems, it is geographically tucked away in a corner of east Yorkshire. It is about 60 miles to Leeds and about an hour on the train to Doncaster, so people in Hull generally want to access services in Hull. They do not want to have to travel for an hour or more. It is worth saying that Hull has one of the lowest car ownership rates in the country, so public transport is another key issue. Until recently, it was not as good as it could have been.

Hull is obviously a city that is ripe for good, co-ordinated advice services and representation. It has always had a good, vibrant network of voluntary and community sector advice agencies. It has an excellent citizens advice bureau, and Age Concern offers advice to older people. Mind is very active, and Choices and Rights gives advice to people with disabilities and champions getting rid of barriers that they encounter.

For 15 years, Hull also had the Humberside law centre. Unfortunately, it closed just before I became a Member of Parliament, but I know about it from its reputation when I worked in law centres. I remember reading about a solicitor called Humphrey Forrest, which I thought was a striking name, who worked at the Humberside law centre. He took a case in the 1990s for trawlermen who were put out of work but received no compensation when the fishing industry in Hull collapsed. Normally, if a business collapses, people are entitled to redundancy and various other payments, but those people had received nothing. Humphrey took the case for a large group of trawlermen in Hull and succeeded in making legal history by getting redundancy payments for them. Humberside law centre had a good reputation in employment law.

The centre also offered free advice and representation for disadvantaged groups in the city. It provided immigration advice and representation at tribunals, and, as I mentioned, advice on employment issues and representation at employment tribunals. Finally, it offered specialist telephone advice to agencies in Hull that dealt with people on a day-to-day basis. If they were not quite sure about the legal ramifications of someone's problem, they could contact the law centre. Overall, Humberside law centre performed a worthwhile function in the city.

The centre was called Humberside law centre, not Hull law centre. It was funded by Hull city council, which has always taken a progressive approach to legal services and recognised the need to invest in advice services to get around some of the problems of social exclusion. The centre was also funded by North East Lincolnshire council, North Lincolnshire council and the East Riding of Yorkshire council. For whatever reason, the three country councils decided to withdraw funding. That left only the money from Hull city council, which was not enough to sustain the law centre. Unfortunately, it closed in 2005, and the city lost experts in social welfare law.

I mentioned Humphrey's landmark case, but the law centre also had a reputation for dealing with disability discrimination cases. One case struck me, as a dog lover, as important. A woman in Hull who was hearing-impaired had a hearing dog. She was turned away from restaurants and cafes when she took her dog with her. Most restaurants and cafes now would recognise a guide dog and allow it to enter, but a hearing dog was a new thing then, and people were not aware of or did not understand the services that it provided to the owner. The law centre was able to help that person achieve recognition of the disability rights of hearing-impaired people in that city.

[Ms Diana R. Johnson]

I became an MP in 2005, and, because I had an interest in advice services I spoke to many groups in Hull who were offering advice to my constituents. At the basic level—I believe it is called level 1—the general signposting and advice services that are available in the city are good, but many organisations told me that there were few places in the city to refer constituents who had more complicated legal problems or complex issues on which they needed advice. I want to comment on a few of the areas where there are problems.

The first area, as I believe many MPs will recognise, is immigration advice. At present there are no solicitors offering immigration advice in Hull, so constituents who want advice have to go to Doncaster, or sometimes London or Leeds. I understand that the Legal Services Commission has now entered into a contract with a firm of solicitors in Doncaster, but as I said at the outset, Doncaster is 60 miles away. I have been told that people often do not receive their travel expenses when they travel to Doncaster. Often, those people do not have a penny to their name. There may be some confusion around solicitors and disbursements. I understand that money is available to allow clients to travel to obtain advice, but my constituents are not receiving that advice or having their travel expenses repaid.

We have an excellent project in Hull—the Leo Schultz project—but it cannot provide the legal representation work that is so badly needed. Its funding is under pressure because it receives funding from the Big Lottery Fund and the council, but the funding from the Big Lottery Fund depends on council funding, which is guaranteed only to November. So potentially, Hull is in a real mess with immigration advice and I think we all know that decent, good immigration advice for asylum seekers and overstayers is vital to the health of the local community; so immigration is a real problem.

Employment is the other issue that I want to focus on. Only one private firm of solicitors in the community legal service directory in Hull offers employment advice and assistance at tribunals. That firm, Myer Wolff and Manley, said that it was exceptionally busy and might take on race, sex and disability discrimination cases if it had a solicitor available, but there is no other provision through the community legal service or any other advice body. The only other place where advice can be obtained is the citizens advice bureau. When the law centre closed, money was put aside for the citizens advice bureau to develop expertise in representation, but to date that has not happened.

Immigration and employment representation are two key areas that have been identified in the community legal service plan as priority areas in Hull, but at the moment they are not at the level they should be. On employment particularly, the Government have introduced a great deal of new legislation to give employees rights in the workplace and we need to ensure that those employees can enforce those rights when they need to.

No advice on community care is available in the city at the moment. Age Concern flagged that up to me as a matter of concern, especially for older people with mental health problems.

Education law is a Cinderella service. There are not many practitioners in education law but parents, particularly those with disabled children, often want good legal advice on the special educational needs options open to them and on what their children can expect.

The situation with housing is better. We have the independent housing advice centre in Hull, which is excellent and offers representation work. However, again, it tells me that it misses the law centre and the back-up that it could have provided.

In 2000, the Consumers Association said that in terms of who provides quality advice—local and specialist community advice services—law centres were considered the best. I know that Humberside law centre, despite having funding problems, as most law centres do at some stage, was quality assured. It had specialists in social welfare law. It also operated a second-tier referral approach to agencies, providing them with access to specialist help. It operated training courses for groups and organisations in the city and, importantly, it operated an educational policy to try to encourage and educate people about their rights.

I wanted to have this debate today because I feel that we are missing a trick on representation work. I know that the community legal service has recently identified a strategy called "making legal rights a reality" and I believe that it is looking at community legal advice centres in urban areas which will have match funding with local authorities. I welcome that because it may be a positive way forward. However, we had a very good law centre in Hull for many years and I believe that we need something similar to carry on the work that it started and to allow my constituents to have the level of legal advice and representation that they deserve. Just because they are tucked away in a far corner of east Yorkshire does not mean that they should not have the best legal advice and legal representation that they can get. The lawyers who devote their careers to law centre work can provide that very special, holistic approach to dealing with some of the most disadvantaged people in our society and ensuring that they are able to enforce their legal rights. Sometimes they do not even know that they have a legal remedy. That is why I wanted this debate today.

4.15 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson) for choosing this subject for debate today and for bringing the far corners of the city of Hull and the needs and interests of its constituents to us here in the House of Commons. She has been a breath of fresh air for her constituency and the House since her election. I have had the opportunity of being on a Standing Committee with her. It is nothing but good news that Hull has her as a Member of Parliament to bring to us and to life the issues of concern to her constituents, as she has done today.

We all readily recognise a number of the things she said, particularly that there is something to be said for a law centre being based in and part of a community so that it can look around for the issues and understand the community to which it is trying to provide legal services.

Humphrey Forest identified the general problem of redundancy among people who had been working in the fishing industry and sought a legal remedy for them when they might not have thought that they had any legal rights. That is telling and thought-provoking.

I agree that it is unfortunate that the law centre was closed. Sometimes, adding together the individual bits of advice given, enumerating the number of cases taken on and looking at the categories they are in does not explain the whole story, and my hon. Friend has told the whole story today. I will ensure that the Legal Services Commission considers her points and responds to them fully.

My hon. Friend is right in saying that we have brought in new rights, such as the right to a minimum wage—I expect that that is important in her constituency—the right for people to request flexible working hours if they have young children, and rights for people with disabilities. However, as she said, if those rights cannot be enforced, they are worthless. They may make us feel good because we introduced them in legislation, but if they are not translated into reality they are meaningless. Her point about ensuring that her constituents, who perhaps need representation but cannot afford to pay for it or who, without an educational approach, may not realise that they have those rights, is important. I want to pass on, through her, my recognition and acknowledgement of the important work done by the community organisations that she mentioned, such as the citizens advice bureau among others.

We in the Department for Constitutional Affairs are committed to ensuring that high-quality legal advice services are available to those who need them but cannot afford them. Those services must be readily accessible at local level.

My hon. Friend made a point about the immigration contract being given to a firm of solicitors in Doncaster, which is 60 miles from Hull and might as well be at the other end of the country for those who do not have a car, if the disbursement policy is not properly applied. I shall ensure that the disbursement issue is looked into; otherwise, the service might as well not be there. I will get the Legal Services Commission to look into the accessibility of the immigration contract and its local impact and to report back to me. I will then write to my hon. Friend.

I agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's comments that, as the service is 60 miles away, it must be better than good in its outreach because it is not in the community. It can respond but it cannot proact. The question is how those outside services are embedded in local community organisations. I know that they work with the Leo Schultz project, which she mentioned. She also mentioned concerns about its sustainability. The organisations also work with the CAB. The question is how embedded and localised services are. I will look into that and get back to her.

The Legal Services Commission has made considerable efforts to alleviate the effect of the closure of the law centre in 2005. Since then, it has let new contracts to cover the categories of law with which the law centre previously dealt. The point about a law centre is that it does not have to go for a contract; it just does the job as it is needed. That work is broader than contracts. However, the contracts that have been let include those on debt, welfare benefits and immigration, which I have mentioned.

As a result of issuing new contracts to legal services providers such as Hull CAB, the number of acts of assistance to people seeking legal advice has increased by about 10 per cent. Despite the fact that the law centre is no longer there, the number of items of advice has increased. New matter starts for specialist legal advice have increased by about 10 per cent., which equates to about 4,500 new cases starting in 2005–06, compared with 4,000 in the previous year. Owing to the allocation of a new contract to Hull CAB in respect of debt, the number of matters dealt with in that category has increased significantly, from just three in 2004–05 to 119 in 2005–06. Early this year, a new immigration contract was let, and 70 cases have been taken on in Hull, but I will examine how those cases were dealt with and where they come from, and we will address those points.

Legal Services Commission initiatives such as the housing possession court duty scheme and Community Legal Service Direct have continued to play a role in ensuring that my hon. Friend's constituents have access to the advice that they need. I recognise her point about the housing advice centre. Between April and December, about 200 people from Hull contacted CLS Direct for help with such matters as debt, employment and welfare benefits. Hull's housing possession court duty scheme helped about 40 people a month during 2005–06. In many instances, that advice helped to prevent people from losing their home.

The Legal Services Commission and the Department for Constitutional Affairs are committed to ensuring that there is adequate provision of good legal and advice services and legal aid in Hull, and that those services are accessible to my hon. Friend's constituents. Through the recently published community legal service strategy, the commission will aim to deliver a service resolutely focused on the needs of her constituents. Services will be developed and located in accordance with local need. Priorities will be agreed locally, with the aim of targeting those who are most in need, who are often the hardest to reach. That will be the thrust of the idea of community legal advice centres and networks.

Over the next few months, the Legal Services Commission will work with the relevant local authorities and with my hon. Friend in establishing the way forward for Hull. She obviously has considerable expertise in these matters, as well as a commitment to her constituents, so I will ensure that the commission draws on her involvement with local people. She will see problems coming before they occur and, on the basis of the expertise that she has developed, given her background of working in law centres and in the advice services movement generally, she will be able to help the commission to shape services.

I am well aware that there have been concerns about provision of social welfare advice in Hull. However, the Legal Services Commission is trying to take a responsible and effective approach in addressing those concerns and it hopes that, despite the closure of Humberside law centre, it has made real progress in ensuring that the supply is able to meet demand. With the measures set out in the community legal service strategy, the Legal Services Commission will continue to work with everyone locally to try to improve the situation and to focus resources on delivering advice in a way that works through and with local organisations for the most disadvantaged and vulnerable people in my hon. Friend's community.

My hon. Friend raised a number of points. We are not happy about a situation in which people have rights but there is unmet need, and we certainly do not want things to slip backwards rather than going forward. Therefore, we will work with her to ensure that the Legal Services Commission works with her and the local authorities so that her constituents have access to high-quality legal advice and assistance.

Hamas and Israel

4.30 pm

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I thank Mr. Speaker for allowing me this debate, and the Minister for being here to listen to my remarks.

Today marks 58 years since Israel declared its independence. Israel is a democracy, committed to western values, freedom and the rule of law, located, I am afraid, in a sea of hostile Arab states. Today also marks 58 years that Israel has been fighting for its survival against those hostile neighbours and terrorist groups who, in many cases, still refuse to recognise Israel's right to exist.

I am thinking in particular of Hamas, the radical Islamist terrorist organisation, which won an overwhelming majority in the Palestinian elections in January. Hamas won 74 of the 132 seats in the Palestinian legislative council elections and has filled the Palestinian Authority with Ministers who, I am afraid to say, defend the deliberate killing of innocent Israeli civilians.

The Hamas movement was born out of the extremist Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. It is committed to the destruction of Israel through armed struggle and the establishment of an Islamic republic of Palestine based on sharia law. Between 1989 and 2005, Hamas killed 579 Israelis, and wounded 3,235 more, in brutal acts of terrorism; some 93 per cent. of these were civilian casualties. Hamas suicide bombers have attacked Israel at least 58 times—symbolically, one for each year since Israel declared its independence in 1948.

Britain should remain steadfast with regard to Hamas and should not be led to water down the three preconditions set by the Quartet on 30 January. Hamas needs to understand that it needs to recognise Israel, commit to non-violence, end terrorism, and accept previous agreements and obligations signed by its Palestinian predecessors. The Minister should not waver: all three conditions must be fulfilled before Britain and the west should even consider dialogue or meetings with Hamas. The Minister must remain firm and vigilant against Hamas, and lead the international community to pressurising Hamas to commit to a two-state solution: a secure Israel living side by side with a viable state of Palestine.

Hamas must end its violence and terrorism, and it is in the British national interest to promote freedom and democracy against that oppression and terror. Her Majesty's Government should not waver on any of the conditions set for the new Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

There are those who hope that Hamas will be moderate in office, but I am afraid that its actions show the opposite. Although it has, by and large, respected the ceasefire negotiated by Abu Mazen in February 2005, many Hamas leaders continue to defend terrorism against Israel, and they ally themselves with abhorrent regimes, themselves state sponsors and financiers of terrorism, such as Iran and Syria, that openly call for Israel to be "wiped off the map".

Last month, Tehran hosted a "support for the Palestinian intifada conference", which was attended by Hamas's political bureau chief, Khaled Meshaal. Iran has pledged $50 million to finance the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority. Hamas is an integral part of the fundamentalist regime in Iran, which, as we all know, seeks to export terrorism and wage jihad against western democracy and values. With close links to an Iranian regime hellbent on acquiring nuclear weapons and destabilising the whole of the middle east, the Hamas Government are exposed as a regime with the same goals: destruction of Israel and an attack on western democracy and values.

Hamas's Foreign Minister, Mahmoud al-Zahar, is openly an extremist and is cultivating links with Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia, rather than—as I am sure we would all wish—showing moderation to the west. On 24 March, Hamas's Interior Minister, Said Siyam, who is responsible for Palestinian internal security forces, publicly committed himself not to order arrests of operatives who carry out terrorist attacks against Israel. Siyam's declaration amounts to an open invitation to all terrorists, including al-Qaeda, Hezbollah, Palestinian Islamic Jihad and the Fatah militias.

In effect, the Hamas regime, far from being a moderating influence, is facilitating continued terrorist attacks on Israel while disclaiming responsibility. Although the Hamas movement appears to abide by a ceasefire with Israel, the policy of the Hamas Government is to allow terrorists free rein. Hamas failed to condemn the first suicide bombing to take place after it took power in January. Instead, it called it "an act of self-defence".

Not only is Hamas refusing to criticise publicly acts of terrorism, but it has actually been implicated in the attacks itself. For example, an investigation into the attempted suicide bombing at the Karni crossing on 26 April revealed that it was carried out by the popular resistance committees in the Gaza strip, which are under the direction of Hamas.

There are glaring inconsistencies in the messages that Hamas sends out to the western and Arab media on the issues of terrorism, Israel and negotiations. Indeed, Hamas's media strategy is to adapt its various messages to the relevant target audience. To the western media, Hamas attempts to put across a soft image; to the Arab media, including that in Palestine, Hamas presents a defiant and uncompromising image, including on issues such as terrorism, the peace process and recognition of Israel.

For example, Hamas's Prime Minister, Ismail Haniya, has been labelled a pragmatist in some of the western press. Yet it was Haniya who took credit for a Hamas suicide bus bombing in 2003, which killed 23 Israelis and wounded 130. In March this year, in the Arabic press, Haniya said the following on the issue of the recognition of Israel:

> "One of the basic principles of the new Government is not to surrender to international threats and to refuse to recognize Israel."

However, days earlier, in the western media, he had said:

> "We will respect the agreements which will ensure the establishment of a Palestinian state on the '67 lines, as well as the release of prisoners. If Israel withdraws to the '67 lines, we will formulate peace in stages."

That dual message speaks for itself. Hamas continues to support terrorism, refuses to recognise Israel and shows no sign at all of accepting the notion of a two-state solution. Sadly, the evidence suggests that, far from a democratic Palestine, we could be witnessing the emergence of an Islamist state on Israel's doorstep, with vested interests from fundamentalist regimes such as Iran and Syria and terrorist groups including al-Qaeda and Hezbollah.

Will Her Majesty's Government grant assurances that they will remain steadfast against Hamas and remain committed to all the preconditions set by the Quartet on 30 January? Will the Minister also make assurances that Her Majesty's Government will not become lenient in interpreting the preconditions set by the Quartet? It is unacceptable when the Foreign Secretary says, as he did in Riyadh only a few weeks ago, that recognition of Israel does not mean a formal declaration by Hamas, but just a practical acceptance of the "reality" of the Jewish state. Hamas, in its entirety, is a terrorist organisation proscribed by the European Union. Will the Minister join me in condemning the leader of the Liberal Democrats in the EU for recently meeting the Hamas Speaker of the Palestinian Parliament?

In conclusion, Britain should stand united with Israel against Hamas and remain vigilant that Hamas recognises Israel, ends terrorism and accepts a two-state solution based on the road map to peace.

4.41 pm

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): Thank you for calling me, Mrs. Anderson. It is a double pleasure to have you chair the debate, because you chaired another Adjournment debate earlier today—we must be the only Assembly in the world that has six Adjournments a day. That debate was on Nepal, another troubled part of the world, and, since the majority of the world's conflicts come under my brief, we will no doubt share the Room again.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on tabling this Adjournment debate. It has come at a crucial time for developments in the middle east, not least because today is Israeli independence day. As he has explained, it is important that we work to ensure that that independence is protected and that the Israeli people are allowed to enjoy a life free from the threat of terrorism, violence and murder that they have faced for so long. Of course, on 25 January a new Palestinian Government were elected and on 28 March the Israeli people also elected a new Government.

As I made clear to the House on 25 April, we recognise Hamas's democratic mandate as a result of free and fair elections, but that mandate comes with responsibilities. Democracy is about more than elections but, as I have also made clear, it is essential that the Hamas-led Government commit to non-violence, recognise Israel, and accept previous agreements and obligations, including the road map. I say that in all humility because I cannot see another way in which we will reach the two-state solution that, in my view, is absolutely vital in the middle east peace process. The road map remains the best way forward.

We are watching developments closely. Hamas needs to start to implement the three principles and to make clear the path it intends to take. Its response to the Tel Aviv suicide bomb attack on 17 April was unacceptable and reprehensible. I thought that the hon. Gentleman's explanation of the expert way in which Hamas manipulates the news media to communicate dual messages to suit its different audiences was valuable and insightful. Never underestimate it because, like Osama bin Laden, it uses the media in a clever and effective way.

There has been a great deal of controversy about what we should do about pledged support and continued support for the Palestinian people. That is important, as the Palestinian people have been hugely subsidised for a long time. I have made known my sadness at going to Ramallah and seeing luxury apartments surrounding the city, despite the fact that the local economy has allegedly collapsed. One wonders where that money came from. A lot of it came from the donations that countries such as ours gave, over the years, to Yasser Arafat and, I am afraid, a lot of it was distributed to his cronies through corruption. The last people to benefit from it were the Palestinians. That rankles, and certainly goes a long way to explain why Hamas did so well in the Palestinian elections. People were looking for an organisation that would challenge corruption, which is something that we must take into account and treat seriously.

The international community and the UK will continue to support the Palestinian people and to help provide for their basic needs. The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for International Development and the Foreign Secretary have all made it clear that the United Kingdom will continue to support the Palestinian people. Although donors have stopped direct budgetary support to the Palestinian Authority, they continue to provide support to the Palestinian people and help to provide for their basic needs. Only a co-ordinated response by the international community will achieve that.

We, along with our EU partners, have a strong record of support for the Palestinian people. On 25 April the Department for International Development announced a £15 million payment to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency. The United Kingdom alone has given £147 million to the Palestinian people since 2001. That is an enormous sum of money. We want to restart our funding to the Palestinian Authority, but we cannot do that until Hamas takes the necessary steps. In the meantime, we are actively looking at how we can help meet the Palestinian people's basic needs.

Of course, this is the hon. Gentleman's Adjournment debate and he has acquitted himself well. However, I remind him that the middle east peace process is a process, and that we should also take the opportunity to remind the new Israeli Government, for whom we have great hopes, that they must stop any action that contravenes the agreement that should be part of the road map. They must stop building illegal settlements and stop the construction of the separation barrier on Palestinian land.

I have been there and I have seen for myself the damage that the separation barrier is doing. I am very much a supporter of the two-state solution, but I have heard some shocking statistics, such as that only 20 per cent. of the barrier is on or behind the agreed green line. Some 80 per cent. of the barrier is in Palestinian territory. That does not help. It does not help those of us who are passionate supporters of Israel and the Israeli people, as much as we are supporters of the Palestinians. It is very important that we recognise that what I have described is contrary to international law and threatens the viability of an agreed two-state solution.

Mr. Hollobone: I thank the Minister for his remarks thus far. Although he has concerns about the location of the barrier, does he recognise that Israel never wanted to build it in the first place, but has been faced with an unprecedented scale of assault on its citizens through suicide bombing? We have had our own recent, unfortunate experience of suicide bombing in this country, but the level of such attacks in Israel is out of all proportion to anywhere else in the world. That is the fundamental reason for designing the barrier in the first place.

Dr. Howells: I understand that completely. On my last visit to Israel I went to talk to what one might call old friends on the Israeli left who were born and brought up on kibbutzim, one of which was, if I recall rightly, on the old road to Jerusalem. They told me very reluctantly that life was a lot easier now the barrier had been built. They admitted that reluctantly because they always wanted to live alongside Palestinians. They did not want divisions. They believed that it was possible for people to live together.

I understand entirely the hon. Gentleman's point. If the Israelis want to build that barrier, that is up to them, and of course that is what they have done. However, the route that the barrier takes is an extremely important issue. If it incorporates Palestinian land—as it certainly has done—there are problems, as the Israeli High Court has admitted. Sometimes it has overruled the proposed routes, saying, "No, it mustn't go that way, because it's illegal." I very much hope that the Israelis, even at this point, listen to pleas from countries such as ours to reconsider that route, because it allows the wound to fester, and there have been too many festering wounds in that part of the world. I understand entirely why the Israelis have built the barrier, but hope very much that they understand that we feel strongly about the route that has been taken.

In answer to the hon. Gentleman's specific question, the Foreign Secretary told the Foreign Affairs Committee in March that we remain committed to key Security Council resolutions Nos. 242, 338 and 1373. We believe that the Israeli Government should adhere to international law, and we remain concerned by Israeli policies on settlements and the barrier—and especially on access to Jerusalem, which threatens to cut off Palestinian east Jerusalem from the west bank. Those policies will have serious economic, social and humanitarian consequences for Palestinians, and they risk reducing the possibility of reaching a final status agreement on Jerusalem.

I shall develop my argument. Although I understand the security considerations, those whom I met in the kibbutz told me that the last thing they want is an economic basket case on the borders of Israel. The Palestinian state must be economically viable, and that will require some rapid rethinking of the way in which blockades can prevent the development of the economy and so on. There has to be a balance. There is never an easy answer to the question of how to protect one's own citizens and at the same time allow the proper economic development of a neighbouring state. It is extremely important.

I shall move on, as I have only a few minutes left. The hon. Gentleman asked if I would give him an assurance that we will remain steadfast against Hamas, at least with its present policies and statements. We stand fully behind the Quartet's three principles of a Hamas commitment to non-violence, its recognition of Israel and its acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the road map. We are monitoring the situation closely. Hamas will be judged not only on its words but on its actions. If Hamas shows real political leadership and imagination, it could make the necessary change; and it should understand that if it makes that change the international community will respond.

I have chosen my words carefully because I know that the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about the matter. I am sure that many in the new Israeli Government will feel that they have to make progress, but they cannot make progress for as long as they adopt their present actions and words. The aftermath of the Tel Aviv bombing reminded us, if we needed reminding, of a ruthless streak in those political thoughts.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the leader of the Liberal Democrats in the European Union. We have made clear our policy on Hamas. I am sorry that the leader of the Liberal Democrats in the European Parliament chose to take the action that he did. I had hoped for a degree of solidarity, but individual Members of Parliament, including Members of the European Parliament, may view the situation differently. That is their prerogative. However, we have made our views clear.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether we would take steps to ensure that other British political parties and western allies abided by the same set of tests for the unreformed Hamas Government. There will be a Quartet meeting on 9 May in New York to discuss the middle east peace process. We are working very closely with the Quartet and our EU partners along the lines that I have set out, so I hope that he can take some comfort from that.

I have lost track of time, Mrs. Anderson; despite the fact that there are clocks all over the place, they tell different times. However, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that we remain committed to the principles of a negotiated two-state solution, and we continue to work towards a just, viable and lasting peace and the establishment of a viable and secure state of Palestine and a secure state of Israel consistent with the Security Council resolutions and the principle of land for peace. If Hamas can move towards the Quartet's three principles, then the peace process can advance. The only viable future for a Palestinian state lies in its having a peaceful relationship with its neighbour Israel.

Mr. Hollobone: I suspect that we may have more time than the Minister imagines. I appreciate what he said about our EU partners. Does he detect any softening in the stance of our EU partners towards Israel, which could disconcert the Israelis as they confront the terrorist threat from Hamas? Traditionally, it has been the US and the UK that have remained steadfast on these issues and some of our continental neighbours have backtracked at crucial times.

Dr. Howells: I can certainly tell the hon. Gentleman that the EU and the US, together with the other major donors, such as Japan, Canada and Norway, have suspended direct funding to the Palestinian Authority, but remain committed to supporting the Palestinian people. Those donors provide the majority of funding to the Palestinian Authority. Some other states, including those in the Arab world, view the situation in a different way, which is their prerogative, but I have not detected any breaking of ranks, if that is what the hon. Gentleman is referring to.

The hon. Gentleman knows full well, because he is very familiar with this part of the world, that different Governments will have different views about how far to move in one direction, and about who to talk to and who not to talk to. There will be situations where some of the aid we give to the United Nations will have to be signed off by someone who turns out to be a Hamas representative or councillor. Inevitably, such things will happen.

I am old enough to remember the early days of our engagement with the Provisional IRA under Prime Minister John Major. That process was fraught with difficulty and a lot of it took place in secret. I have not noticed a great breaking of ranks or people trying to engage with Hamas—or other people—in various ways. We expect the Palestinian Authority to take long-overdue action against people firing rockets into Israel, trying to provoke confrontations at the borders or identifying, recruiting and arming suicide bombers. Despite the barrier, they still get through; they got through to Tel Aviv.

I have not picked up an indication that there is any desire among any of our partners or allies to break ranks in that respect. I cannot answer for other Governments. Very early on, the Russian Government met Hamas. They were very cautious about that meeting, from what I can tell. I think that Hamas got the message from Russia that the latter was very much part of the Quartet, which was helpful. However, I understand the hon. Gentleman's trepidation.

As I say, the only viable future for a Palestinian state lies in its having a peaceful relationship with its neighbour, Israel. We welcome the commitment of Prime Minister Olmert and President Abbas to negotiations, and we urge both sides to resume negotiations as soon as possible. We want the peace process to make real progress. The Palestinian and Israeli people suffer in the end. There ought to be enough good will there, and enough diplomatic expertise; they have been at it for long enough to make progress now on the middle east peace process.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising the subject; it gives us the opportunity to say once again that this country, this Government and I am sure his party, too, want this terrible conflict to draw to a close so that people in that area can live in peace and stability and look forward to a decent future for their children.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Five o'clock.

[JOHN BERCOW in the Chair]

Enterprise

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Heppell.]

2.30 pm

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): May I confess at the start that I am slightly disappointed, Mr. Bercow? This is the first time that I have sat under your chairmanship, and I sincerely trust that it will not be a humbling experience. However, it also means that I will not be able to enjoy your usual vigorous interventions, and I am tempted to say that putting you in the Chair is probably the only way to keep you in order. None the less, a poacher turned gamekeeper can demonstrate characteristics that have not previously been seen, and I am sure that you will be strict. Sincerely, though, I am pleased to speak under your chairmanship for the first time.

Enterprise is a term that covers the formation of new businesses and the expansion of existing businesses, and being seen as enterprising is of great importance if an area is to attract businesses. To take a personal perspective, the issue is important to me because I entered Parliament as a result of the frustration that I felt working with unemployed young people in parts of Cardiff, including parts that are now in my constituency. Those young people had no hope, no future, no inspiration and, therefore, no enterprise, but that situation has been transformed over recent years as a result of the strength of the economy and initiatives such as the new deal. Such initiatives have given young people opportunities and encouragement as a result of a genuine partnership between the Government and business. That underlines the fact that many of society's problems cannot be adequately dealt with without successful businesses, a strong economy or enterprise.

In essence, enterprise is about having a can-do attitude to life, whether people are motivated by the wish to run a business, to be the best at something or to change the world around them for the better. Many successful business people are inspired by all three of those factors, as well as by the motivation of making money, and there are also enterprising people in the public sector and the third sector. There is evidence that we can inspire young people to be entrepreneurial—to have that can-do attitude—and encourage business growth if we create the right environment, and that is certainly the Government's aim.

The UK has great enterprise potential, and a recent World Bank study, for instance, places us in the top 10 of the world's top 30 economies in terms of business-friendly regulation, but that does not mean that we should rest on our laurels. We are committed to one of the world's most ambitious programmes of reducing the burden of regulation on business, and steps to do so are well in hand. We are simplifying our regulatory approach and our enforcement structure, we are reducing the number of enforcement bodies from 31 to seven and we are consulting on new measures to ensure that enforcement and penalties strike the right balance. Such issues rightly come up every time I meet representatives from different sectors of industry and business, and they agree with our engagement, but always encourage us to go further.

The other side of the equation is also extremely important. Government procurement is enormously important in encouraging business, which is why we are working to simplify the way in which businesses can get into the business of supplying the Government. The Supply2.gov portal provides an opportunity to reduce the duplication that is such a burden on small businesses and increase opportunities for them to be part of public sector procurement. Sometimes, the problem is that everything is too complicated, and sometimes things have genuinely been too burdensome, but sometimes the problems are a matter of perception. By providing a simpler methodology and making use of the internet and web-based opportunities, we can genuinely open up the possibilities for small businesses.

That is crucial because small businesses represent 99 per cent. of all businesses in the UK and are the backbone of the UK economy. At the beginning of 2004, there were 4.3 million small and medium-sized enterprises, and the majority were small, with fewer than 50 employees. That was up from 4 million in the same period in 2003, so there has been an increase in the number of small businesses, and that in itself reflects a growth in enterprise.

As I said in respect of regulation, we need to strike the right balance. Balance offers opportunities. Women comprise 51 per cent. of the UK population and 46 per cent. of those who are active in the labour market. Nearly 1 million women are self-employed, but only 27 per cent. of all self-employed people are women. The Government recognise that the pace of development needs to accelerate if we are to tap the massive economic potential represented by the development of women's enterprise. Indeed, at Department of Trade and Industry questions earlier today, one of my Back-Bench colleagues made a comparison with the USA, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Women and Equality said that we would have about half a million extra businesses in the UK if we had the same level of entrepreneurship and start-ups among women as the United States of America. However, she also said that things have improved, as not so long ago the figure would have been 750,000 extra businesses, so there has been progress.

Given that we have been missing out on many women's potential contribution to the economy, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry approved the setting up of the taskforce on women's enterprise. It is to be operational in June and its objective is to provide high-profile leadership to accelerate women's enterprise development and promote confidence and a can-do attitude among the many women who have the talents and ability to contribute to the economy. The taskforce will be light on process and heavy on delivery to achieve the greatest impact in the shortest time.

Throughout the UK, more than 250,000 black and ethnic minority enterprises contribute £13 billion a year to the British economy, and many of them are high-quality and growing businesses. Despite so much entrepreneurial activity, however, a great many people are still disadvantaged because of their ethnicity or gender or because they live in deprived neighbourhoods, and they need our help. To use a business term, we need to segment our approach to ethnic minority communities, because some have a background in business and more ready family experience of it than others. We need to develop an inclusive approach to encourage those who do not have such a family or community background to go into business.

In December 2004, the Chancellor asked the National Employment Panel what could be done to increase the employment and business growth of ethnic minority and faith groups. The panel, working with the DTI's Ethnic Minority Business Forum, made 10 recommendations at the conclusion of its work. The Chancellor accepted them, and a cross-Whitehall working group is taking them forward as part of a larger taskforce, which is looking at ethnic minority employment issues in general.

A key barrier for black and ethnic minority entrepreneurs is access to finance. That is why the DTI's Small Business Service is undertaking an ethnic minority booster survey as part of the in-depth Bank of England-led Big Survey, which will compare results from five key ethnic minority groups with the experience of white-owned businesses. The evidence from the booster survey will help us to understand the implications of ethnicity, and perhaps some of its diversity, for raising finance and it will inform future action on the issue.

The Small Business Service is committed to working with banks and financial institutions to break down barriers and increase the availability of start-up finance, loans and risk capital. From 1 April, regional development agencies became responsible for community development finance initiatives. Incidentally, they also became responsible for the local delivery of Business Link in their regions, which is a welcome step forward. We want the Business Link brand to be provided consistently in every part of the country, and a regional emphasis on performance can drive that agenda forward. However, on the community development finance initiatives, I am pleased that there are signs that the financial needs of the Muslim community are being recognised by the private sector. The Islamic Bank of Britain has been created and at least one international bank is now advertising sharia-compliant financial products.

I want to include a word about social enterprise. People start a business for many different reasons, as I mentioned earlier. Some are inspired to use a business model to solve what they see as a social or environmental problem. They want to do good as much as they want to make money, and feel that they can do that better by independently generating the finance to run a genuine business than by depending on charitable means or public subscriptions.

The Government have a strategy to support and raise awareness of the strength and contribution of social enterprises. Department of Trade and Industry research on social enterprise last year revealed that there are at least 15,000 social enterprises in the UK employing more than 450,000 people and contributing more than £5 billion a year to gross domestic product. It is difficult to be totally sure about the figures, because there is not one model for social enterprise. Some enterprises will be registered as companies, some will be partnerships, and some will be owned almost individually or by associations.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): I have just been reviewing some of the Government's decisions, and I noticed that the figure given in the document "Match Winners" that the Minister issued to Members a few months ago, which I commend as extremely positive, is £18 billion a year. He has mentioned a figure of £5 billion. Which is correct?

Alun Michael: It depends on whether one is referring to contribution to GDP or turnover. The "Match Winners" publication and the research last year to which I referred are an attempt to bottom out the contribution that is made. At the moment we can say that it is big and has the capacity to become much bigger. I would hesitate to claim that our figures are totally accurate; we are getting towards providing a quantum. I would certainly be happy to give the hon. Gentleman more detail about specific figures and how they compare.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for referring to "Match Winners", because when that publication arrived on my desk I was delighted with it. It profiles several organisations and demonstrates in an inspiring way what can be done. Often that inspiration is needed. When people read the examples in the document, they say to themselves, "Well, I could do that." Enterprise is about having the confidence to do things.

The main point to be made about social enterprise is the extent to which it acts as a powerful motor in the UK economy. Social enterprises are also an important source of jobs. We know that they employ some 750,000 people, of whom about two thirds are employed full-time, so they are serious businesses. About 300,000 people work for social enterprises as volunteers.

The vast majority of social enterprises exist to help particular groups of people, either through employment or by providing goods and services. Sometimes they hit the triple bottom line very effectively. Perhaps I may mention in that context Track 2000 in my constituency. The recycling of materials is one of the positive benefits that it brings about. It employs adults with learning difficulties, who can therefore make a real contribution in a real job. Recycled goods—particularly white goods—sold at a low price make a serious contribution to the needs of young people, for example, who have been homeless and are trying to get back on their feet and establish a new home, perhaps after a period recovering from alcoholism or drug abuse. That one little organisation is not just hitting the triple bottom line. It is scoring hits on four or five economic, social and environmental benefits. There are many more like that in the country. I speak of the one in my constituency with affection, because it has been going for several years and has been remarkably resilient in continuing, but I am sure that other hon. Members could cite examples from their constituencies.

The groups most commonly helped by such enterprises are people with disabilities, young people, the elderly and people on low incomes. Nearly a quarter of the social enterprises that were surveyed also had environmental objectives, as well as social objectives. It is difficult, however, to overestimate the impact of enabling people who otherwise would not be part of the economy to participate in it by having jobs, giving them pride and self-worth.

Social enterprises are often particularly well placed to contribute to economic regeneration activities through their community focus. For example, the Shoreditch Trust is using social enterprise to deliver its succession strategy for regeneration. The aim is to ensure revenue streams to support continuing services beyond the new deal for communities' 10-year funding programme. By forming partnerships with market leaders, each venture is ensured access to public sector and commercial expertise. Another example is the Eaga partnership, which delivers an environmental benefit and warmth to poorer families and pensioners throughout the country and is now a large, effective and successful commercial organisation. However, it remains a social enterprise.

I could mention many other such enterprises, but shall refer to just one more now. I shared a platform with someone from Antur Tawe who showed us a photograph of demonstrators outside the local council building. They were demonstrating about a wind farm, but not against it; they were objecting to the local authority's intention to turn it down, because it was a project on which they had been engaged. That community was not having things done to it; it wanted the benefit of environmentally friendly energy and a contribution to the wider community.

Enterprise needs to be seen and understood as a positive and worthwhile activity, and it should be seen in that light, not just by young people thinking about their futures but by people of all ages making career choices, and by society at large, so that those who choose to engage in enterprise are supported and encouraged. However, as John Maynard Keynes once observed,

"The difficulty lies, not in the new ideas, but in escaping the old ones, which ramify, for those brought up as most of us have been, into every corner of our minds."

We talk too easily about enterprise, and business in general, as an activity that stands alone. It does not. Enterprise must be about something—making and selling something, or giving or selling a service. Social enterprise is about improving society or protecting the environment, but doing so commercially. It is vital that enterprise activity should be encouraged in the UK. That encouragement starts with the creation of the right mindset across all communities and at all ages. That means giving people a can-do attitude in all walks of life—not just in connection with wanting to start a business.

We are working hard to tackle the perception of young people, and looking for ways to build an enterprising culture in our next generation of potential entrepreneurs. That is happening in schools, stimulated by the provision of enterprise entitlement funding for pupils at key stage 4. It is also happening outside the classroom, particularly through the enterprise week initiatives. Last year, enterprise week, which promotes enterprise to young people, was held in November. It was two and a half times bigger than it had been the previous year, and 408,000 people from around the UK attended the 2,215 events that were held. I hope that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) will not respond to me in too challenging a way about those statistics; I think that they are right, but it might have been 2,216 or even 2,214. Certainly, a very large number of events were held, and a lot of people were involved.

Mr. Prisk: I shall go in another direction, if I may, rather than contesting the details of the statistics. Many of the measures that the Minister has described are worthy and entail good ambitions. However, how much does he personally feel one can teach entrepreneurship? To what extent is it in a person's instinct or nature?

Alun Michael: For many years people thought that enterprise could not be taught, and that either people were born with a capacity for business or they were not. In recent years those ideas have been challenged in business and social enterprise. One might ask, "Why have business schools if you can't teach business skills?" One of the people who challenged the ideas was Lord Young of Dartington, that great social entrepreneur and man of ideas who, among other things, wrote the 1945 Labour party manifesto and inspired Dartington hall, the Open university, the Baby Naming Society and the School for Social Entrepreneurs. I attended the graduation ceremony of the social entrepreneurs who had been through the school's course. It was quite stunning to see people who had not only been inspired to become social entrepreneurs, but been given the skills and professionalism to take that forward.

Two things can be done. One is to provide the skills, so that people do not have to make too many mistakes or fail too many times, although it is generally recognised that a willingness to take risks and therefore fail in business is a prerequisite for long-term success. The second thing is to develop the aspiration. There is a great deal of evidence that engaging young people with the idea that they might set up their own business and making that part of the culture can make a big difference.

The enterprise week events—which, if I am right, will have a significant cumulative effect over the coming years—were run by 722 organisations. That is a significant engagement across the country. They in turn were helped by 3,874 businesses. Enterprise week is the annual focal point of the "Make your mark" campaign, which aims to raise awareness of the value and relevance of developing entrepreneurial capacity and to foster an entrepreneurial culture among young people and the people who influence them. We want people in schools to be talking about enterprise not theoretically, as though it were a branch of economics or business studies, but as something that engages the imagination. That is the hope in developing the enterprise work in schools.

The campaign is co-ordinated by Enterprise Insight, which was founded by the Confederation of British Industry, the British Chambers of Commerce, the Institute of Directors and the Federation of Small Businesses, with the DTI as a partner providing significant and increasing funding to enterprise week. I am delighted that that is the case.

To return to the point that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford made, the effect of such interventions can be staggering. The Global Entrepreneurship Monitor found that the proportion of adults expecting to found a business increases by more than 100 per cent. if they have experienced enterprise education or enterprise training earlier in life, and that the proportion who actually start businesses increases by more than 75 per cent. That is powerful evidence of the value of saying that we do not have to wait for entrepreneurs to appear and that we can encourage more of them to come forward and more people to have the confidence to think that that might be them. I was therefore particularly heartened to hear that the global chief executive of GEM has said that a cultural change is evident in the UK:

"Since 2002, there does appear to be a step change in attitudes towards entrepreneurship especially among the young".

I am certain that seeing entrepreneurship as something that we all want to encourage, inspire and celebrate will make a long-term difference to the UK economy and to our international competitiveness. I have been inspired when meeting young people in the national awards ceremony and hearing about the work that they did to reach the regional and national final. I also saw one of the early rounds of last year's competition at a venue in Yorkshire, where eight schools were present.

A lot of the work comes down to the basic level of putting the idea in people's minds. The other side of that coin is the big difference in how many 17 to 20-year-olds in various regions think that they might set up their own business. In one group, none thought that they would set up their own business, although with a bit of probing I discovered that one wanted to start a rock band and that another wanted to become a hairdresser. I suggest that both of those involve setting up businesses. However, the culture in another group was different, with three quarters thinking that they might do so. Those young people were not different socially or in terms of educational background, but they were in terms of their environment and self-confidence.

If we can spread to all our young people, to all the different communities that make up our mixed society, to every region and to women as well as to men the idea that they might succeed, our future in an increasingly competitive global market, in which nothing can be taken for granted, will be bright. Therefore, we need entrepreneurship. We need our young people to be successful entrepreneurs and, to be able to compete in the world, we need to offer such inspiration. There is much more that I could say, but I should stop now. I look forward to hearing other contributions to the debate.

2.56 pm

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): I should like to match the Minister—or perhaps not match, otherwise we could be here for the full three hours—in saying that it is a pleasure to see you in the Chair as our steward this afternoon, Mr. Bercow. I suspect that our sitting will not be too rowdy, although I cannot speak for all hon. Members, so we shall see how we do. I hope that if we lack in quantity, we shall at least have a degree of quality and that you will steer us appropriately, Mr. Bercow.

Many of the sentiments that the Minister expressed are shared on the Opposition Benches. However, I start by saying that the first and overriding objective of enterprise is to generate wealth; that is the principal contribution of enterprise to our society. Enterprise, after all, pays for our schooling, our health care, our salaries as public servants, and the policing and security services that we all desire. One should therefore begin by recognising that business and enterprise are first and foremost about wealth creation. This debate is about the wider role of enterprise. As the Minister highlighted, businesses can help to build and sustain communities in a range of ways; but those social ambitions, to which I shall allude later, however worthy, must come after a recognition of the principal objective of generating wealth.

In 2000 the Government set themselves the target of making this country the best place in which to set up and run one's own business by 2005. That deadline has come and gone, and sadly the target is far from being achieved, although it would be churlish not to recognise that there has been progress in some areas. However, I am afraid that in other areas things are getting worse, not better.

Recent research by Barclays Bank shows that the number of business start-ups fell last year by 13 per cent., which is the largest fall in a decade. This country's start-up rate for small businesses remains half that of the United States of America. That is not the only problem, however. Since 1997, this country's competitiveness ranking in the world has dropped from fourth to 13th. All hon. Members would recognise that we need to reverse that pattern, but I am concerned that the Government are, to a degree, taking the creation of wealth and economic growth for granted. Of course, Governments do not run businesses—the Minister would not claim that. Nor do they create wealth, but they can set the environment in which we can maximise those two processes. That is where I would contend that the Government are failing, and that is not just my view.

I refer the House to a survey published today by the London chamber of commerce, in which 78 per cent. of company directors say that is now harder for a small business to survive than it was in 1997, and 62 per cent. say that starting a new business is more difficult than it was nine years ago. I suspect that the Minister will agree that those figures are rather depressing; one would have hoped for rapid change and progress and not for people in business to have the perception that, for them, things have got worse.

To prosper, business needs clarity in the law and certainty that it can plan ahead, yet the watchword in politics is change, not continuity. Indeed, the Chancellor is forever meddling and tinkering, constantly changing and adjusting the tax system. The result is a hideously complex and overly burdensome system, which in some instances deters the very people whom it is meant to encourage. I shall give a simple example.

The entirely sensible idea of a tax credit to encourage research and development has sadly not produced the benefits that it might have done, and I contend that that is partly because the rules have been changed in every Budget since its inception. The result is that research and development spending by United Kingdom businesses has dropped by 3 per cent. since 1997 as a proportion of the gross domestic product.

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman referred to spending, but does he not agree that the R and D tax credit has provided £795 million of Government support for small and medium-sized enterprises since its inception, the majority going to small and medium-sized manufacturers?

Mr. Prisk: That money is welcome, but if the total spend by businesses had not fallen, how much more could have been achieved? In that sense, the Government are restricted in their original and worthy intention of encouraging the process because the Treasury constantly changes the rules. I know that the Minister is not a Treasury Minister, but I am sure that he will do his best to challenge the Treasury and to ensure that it understands that when it tinkers with the system it makes people hesitate when trying to work out whether or not to invest over a two or three-year period. It is not what we seek, and I am sure that it is not what the Government intend, but that drop in R and D spend concerns us all.

The Minister referred to the fact that the Government have made a number of promises about the burden of regulation. In some instances, but not all, their actions belie their words. For example, in its latest study on the subject, the British Chambers of Commerce found that the burden of extra regulation since Labour came to power in 1997 had cost business nearly £52 billion. Indeed, when trying to total up the numbers, one finds that nearly 20,000 new regulations have been made since 2001, but that only 27 have been amended or repealed.

The Government are now moving to better regulation, and with those figures one can understand why. However, tinkering around with improved parliamentary procedures under the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill will not deal with the fundamental problem. We need a serious and rounded consideration of what drives the tide of regulation. One fundamental driver of regulation is that Whitehall has little understanding or experience of what running a small or medium-sized business is all about. The culture of Whitehall is concerned with output, not with the effect of its actions. New laws and regulations are frequently the first resort, but I suggest that they should be the last resort. Changing the culture of Whitehall—of both Ministers and civil servants—is an ambition that I seek to fulfil in my present role.

Another area that needs change in order to encourage enterprise in society is the Government's support for business. The CBI recently said that about £8 billion was spent every year supporting small business. Much of that sum goes to the agricultural community. Of more concern is the number of Government schemes. Some months ago, when I took on my present job, I decided to check the number. Indeed, it is confirmed in the Red Book—I know that you will be familiar with it, Mr. Bercow—which details some of the trickier issues in its latter pages. It is a staggering figure; approximately 3,000 separate Government support schemes, grants, initiatives, tax reliefs—call them what you will—are currently in operation. That maze of money is expensive to administer and wasteful in practice; and because it is complicated and because time is precious to them, small businesses are often deterred from participating in schemes rather than encouraged to proceed. That is a symptom of a Government who often struggle to understand the practical needs of business.

In March, the Chancellor told us that the Government recognised the problem. Hallelujah! But what are they going to do? They want to reduce the number of schemes from 3,000 to no more than 100 by 2010, and they will do it through a marvellous process called deproliferation. Without wishing to rush to the Oxford English Dictionary, I am keen to know what it will mean in practice. I am sure that the Minister will tell us. I want to know whether the change will reflect the needs of business or the diktats of the Treasury. I am thrilled that the Minister is about to enlighten us.

Alun Michael: I was about to offer the hon. Gentleman an opportunity to reflect on what has already been done. When I was at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, well over 100 strands of finance were reduced in a process of deproliferation to three strands. It was not easy, because those strands had grown up over several Governments and had decades of background. And the Department of Trade and Industry has brought 100 schemes together into eight. I would be happy to send him details of work that has been successfully accomplished.

Mr. Prisk: I am delighted that the Minister can demonstrate such a record and I hope that he will able to bring it to bear in his current role. To that end, I have some questions for him. Which of the current schemes does he think are underperforming? Which does he feel are highly effective? Which schemes does he intend to keep, and which does he feel should be scrapped? In particular, business will want to know whether the overall amount of money spent in support of business will remain the same, or whether the Government intend to deproliferate the amount of money as well as the number of schemes. If he catches your eye again in this packed debate, Mr. Bercow, it will be super if the Minister enlightens us.

As the debate is about enterprise and its contribution to society, I turn to the social contribution that enterprise can make. The Government have rightly made much of their targets to encourage enterprise among disadvantaged communities and under-represented groups. Given the Minister's experience, he alluded to those matters thoroughly and effectively. Unfortunately, however, the Government have failed to meet some of those targets.

Women and ethnic minorities are still significantly under-represented among the self-employed. Although 4 per cent. of women are now self-employed compared to 3.6 in 2000, the proportion of women among the self-employed dropped from 27.8 per cent. to 26.7 per cent. between 2000 and 2005. The proportion of women entrepreneurs has fallen. The result is that nearly twice as many men as women expect to start a business. The gap between male and female self-employment is widening.

The Minister touched on the question of access to finance, and I am aware that Ministers plan a meeting on financial access for women entrepreneurs. Given the importance of this issue, will the Minister agree to report back to the House on the results of that meeting?

[Mr. Prisk]

In his opening remarks, the Minister mentioned the taskforce on women's enterprise and said that it would be light on process, heavy on delivery. What a marvellous phrase; I must use it at some point.

Alun Michael: I am sure you will.

Mr. Prisk: Probably when I am trying to persuade my wife that I have done all the things that I was meant to do. I suspect that I will have to pay a fee for the patent on that remark, given that it is the Minister's.

So the taskforce will be light on process, heavy on delivery. To that end, when can we expect tangible changes that women entrepreneurs will see in the marketplace?

Success at increasing ethnic minority entrepreneurship has also been limited. Again, the Minister touched on that, but glided over it rather professionally. Although the total number of people from ethnic minorities who are self-employed has increased, the population of ethnic minorities has increased at a higher rate, so the proportion of our ethnic minority communities who are self-employed has again fallen. That is a concern. Will the Minister give us his thoughts on why the policies are not succeeding?

The Minister talked about perception, which is crucial. Getting more people to consider working for themselves is a challenge, particularly if the perception of business, entrepreneurship and capitalism is negative. It is fair to say that until recently the broadcast media was either indifferent or rather cynical about the business world. Few programmes dealt with the question of business, and almost none tried to understand what makes business people tick. I vaguely recall—perhaps you can assist me with the title, Mr. Bercow—that Sir John Harvey-Jones used to do a rather good programme about this in the '80s, but there has been little else since. That is why programmes such as "Dragons' Den" on BBC 2 have been immensely helpful. I understand that nearly 3 million people watch that programme, which is about entrepreneurship. It is quite cut and thrust, but it demonstrates—along with "The Apprentice", "Make Me a Million" and other such programmes, which I am obviously far too busy to watch, but try to see when I can—that there is an appetite to learn more about how business works. It also demonstrates that anyone—I stress anyone—can become their own boss.

Countering that positive step is the anti-enterprise language that we hear from too many journalists and some politicians. Those who break the law in business must be brought to book, but some politicians and, sadly, senior Ministers, are far too quick to use terms such as "fat cats" to bash business. Bashing business might produce popular headlines, but it undermines the goal of promoting enterprise. I hope that the Minister will, if the Chancellor is again tempted to make negative remarks, immediately correct him on them. I look forward to that moment perhaps less than he does.

Being positive about business is important, particularly if we are to foster more social enterprises. The Minister and I had a small exchange on that subject. As he pointed out, a social enterprise is a business with primarily social objectives. There are over 15,000 such businesses in the UK, which, I have written in my notes, generate approximately £18 billion per annum. Having checked this with the Minister earlier, I will say simply that they deliver many billions of pounds per annum to the economy and employ nearly half a million people.

The Government have made some hopeful and positive steps in fostering more social enterprises. My party and I share that ambition wholeheartedly. We need to encourage more bold resourcefulness—to use the definition of enterprise—in creating opportunities for the young and employed, protecting our environment and renewing our communities. For example, Jamie Oliver has, with his London restaurant, Fifteen, seen 37 graduates, many of whom come from disadvantaged or broken homes, through the process of becoming chefs. That is to be applauded. As a Cornishman, I am delighted that he is taking that idea to Watergate bay in Cornwall, where he hopes to repeat the process. I add my support to that welcome idea.

We must actively encourage the work of people such as Jamie Oliver and of familiar social enterprises such as Cafédirect and The Big Issue, which is, I suppose, a pioneer in this field. I believe that the Government intend to publish an update to their social enterprise policy on 18 May. Perhaps the Minister can confirm that. If it is the case, we very much wish to engage positively with the Government in that area. If we can do so in a way that will help to encourage more social enterprises, I would very much welcome the opportunity to have whatever discussions the right hon. Gentleman thinks appropriate to find areas of bipartisanship that will enable us to push forward that worthy process.

One sector that makes a significant contribution to the economy but is often overlooked is people who run their own businesses or provide services from home. That is different from home working, which involves people working for employers. According to Microsoft, about 8 million people run their own businesses from home. Approximately 2,000 people each week start a new business from home. When one looks at the demographics, one finds that those are the very people whom the Government wish to encourage. They are often parents, older people and women, who find it particularly helpful.

The advantages of home-based businesses are significant and various. Being based at home allows owners to work flexibly, which means that they can much more effectively juggle their many other family commitments such as bringing up young children or caring for elderly relatives. That type of working brings wider benefits to society. People working from home are more likely to spend their money in their local communities, and less likely to commute, thus reducing congestion and CO_2 emissions.

Such working also has an impact on neighbourhood safety. I used to have a home-based business and worked at home, travelling for my clients when I needed to, as technology allowed me to work in that way. That meant that along my road, there was always someone around in the day, as I was one of about three such people in a street of 20 homes. I know from talking to my local police that burglaries happen pre-eminently during the working day. People working from home make it far more difficult for burglars to break into homes with impunity.

Another benefit to having a home-based enterprise is improved quality of life. In this House, we talk a great deal about the work-life balance, and rightly so. What better solution for many people than to be able to work from home? That is a rarely recognised, hidden benefit. For all those reasons, and as technology develops, it is interesting that the home is now the preferred location from which to start a small business. That is often not recognised in this place or the economy as a whole, but it is time that the Government recognised it, and acted to ensure that home-based businesses are encouraged and supported. Regulatory barriers need to be reduced, and the benefits to individuals and communities that I have mentioned should be recognised and promoted.

Sadly, the Treasury has, in recent years, been the enemy of the home-based business. Measures such as IR35 make it far harder for people to be self-employed. I hope that the Minister will have the courage to recognise the real worth of home-based enterprises and the self-employed, and positively champion their needs to the Treasury and the Chancellor. I have decided to make some progress on this, and will meet representatives of home-based businesses such as the Professional Contractors Group and Shout99, and organisations such as Enterprise Nation, to make sure that the Conservatives fully understand the contribution of that sector. We intend to identify how a future Conservative Government could help.

Let me turn to the role of another group in the community. Local enterprise supports communities in many ways, but that support is best illustrated by the retail sector, particularly small, independent shops. Whether in rural, suburban or, for that matter, urban communities, small shops are often the focal point. They can provide much more than just services. I tend to think of my constituency, where in many communities, whether they be small towns or villages, small shops provide the personal contact that is missing elsewhere. The owner will often know the customer, their family background and their trials and tribulations, and will be able to engage with them. They are therefore able to provide the personal touch that communities, frankly, need more than ever.

The Government have a duty to consider how their actions affect small independent shops. About six weeks or so ago, I called on the Minister's colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe), to try to lead a debate on the future of small shops. Sadly, nothing has happened to date. Many independent businesses are getting frustrated and they feel that they are running out of time.

I have tried to take the lead, organising a summit of the industry's representative bodies to discuss the challenges that face independent retailers. There are many issues. We can consider Sunday trading, supermarkets, local parking schemes, planning and the fact that business crime is not included in police force statistics; they all impinge on small shops.

I was encouraged by the positive wish across the political spectrum to see a set of sensible and balanced policies that encourage consumers to recognise the value of their shops, and encourage small shops to be able to compete better, whether by removing the barriers that Government create locally and nationally or by trying to ensure that large players do not abuse their position. That is why I have made it clear that my party and I strongly support a full and comprehensive investigation by the Competition Commission to ensure that we resolve once and for all whether allegations made against the large players in the grocery market, the supermarkets, are correct and, if they are, that they are acted on.

I do not know whether those allegations are correct, but I do know that a restricted inquiry, which considers planning or land banks but not the broader questions of the supply chain, late payments and so on, will satisfy no one. It will not be in the interests of consumers or of shops, large or small. Those are all reasons why the issue needs to move forward, and I hope that the Minister will take back to his colleagues in the Department a genuine wish to seek out the steps that we can take to help small shops.

In recent weeks, following on from that summit, I have tried to do a number of other things. I have been actively involved in supporting the Evening Standard's excellent "Save our Small Shops" campaign. My party and I have endorsed the Friends of the Earth "Shop Local First" campaign. Those campaigns are simply about encouraging people to recognise the value of those shops and to realise that unless they use them, they will lose them.

Enterprise has many roles in society. First and foremost, it generates the wealth that pays for the services on which the rest of us rely, but its values run deeper. Entrepreneurs epitomise one of the reasons why I came into politics and why I am a member of the Conservative party. No matter who someone is, whatever their background, colour, creed, race or gender, if they have the ability, ambition and will to work they can be their own boss and can make their own living in the world. That value applies to all forms of enterprise, whether they are home-based, local shops, the self-employed, large and small enterprises, or social enterprises. Fostering and nurturing that sense of aspiration and enterprise should be the role of Government, not stifling entrepreneurship through undue regulation and an unhealthy aversion to risk.

Making this country the best place in which to set up and run one's own business has so far eluded the Government. I hope that they will recognise their mistakes and change course. If they are prepared to do so, the Conservatives will be the first to commend them.

Jenny Willott (Cardiff, Central) (LD): I was glad to hear the Minister say that failing and then succeeding often leads to long-term success in enterprise. I hope that the same applies to political careers.

At the risk of stating the obvious, enterprise is a good thing and has an impact on many different sectors in our lives, as mentioned by the Minister and the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk). It has a huge financial impact on employment, local economies and local societies. Without wealth creation, there is no wealth to spread. Enterprise also introduces invention and innovation, and can make the economy more dynamic, as it introduces new ideas and allows a large proportion of small firms to be innovative.

Small businesses, as has been mentioned, often give job opportunities to people who would not necessarily be able to get jobs elsewhere—women, ethnic minorities and those who are disabled. Social enterprises play an important role, and, as we represent neighbouring constituencies, I would like to associate myself with the Minister's comment about Track 2000, which has a successful operation across Cardiff. Such organisations play an important role in the communities where they operate.

I would like to consider three issues in particular. The first is the increasing burden of regulation on businesses, particularly small businesses. The second is the battle for the grocery sector. The third is the social role and impact of big businesses, which we must not overlook.

The Government's role should be to encourage enterprise and to interfere much less in the day-to-day operation of businesses, whether large or small. The burden of regulation placed on businesses increased by £10 billion last year in the UK—a staggering amount—and the total burden estimated by the British Chambers of Commerce is now £50 billion. That clearly has a stifling impact on businesses' ability to grow and prosper.

Regulation is probably the biggest issue for businesses, although it is not all the fault of the UK Government, as 50 per cent. of regulation comes from the European Union. That clearly has an impact. As the Minister will know, the Liberal Democrats have been calling for a while now for the Government to adopt the Dutch approach to deregulation. We were delighted to hear in the recent Budget announcement that they had decided to do that. However, in Holland each Government Department aims to cut regulation by 25 per cent. per annum, and a Minister is specifically responsible for overseeing that. The Department of Trade and Industry plans to cut UK regulation by 1 per cent. by 2010, which is not on the same scale as the Dutch approach. As the burden increased by £10 billion last year, that is a start, but there is clearly a long way to go.

The burden of regulation affects small businesses disproportionately, since they lack the staff and often the financial resources to deal with filling in numerous forms and so on. Over-regulation is inhibiting the competitiveness of a number of small firms in the UK. We would like to see the Government do more to reduce the burden. They should make more use of sunset clauses and post-implementation reviews and possibly take a one-in, one-out approach to legislation. They should set higher targets to reduce regulation and have a Minister take overall responsibility.

Alun Michael: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for espousing a Government policy—the one-in, one-out approach. I am delighted to hear that we will have her support as we continue to take that approach to regulation.

Jenny Willott: I hope that that will go on from here, so that there is a definite one-in, one-out approach. If that is the case, I am certain that both Liberal Democrat and Conservative Members will support that.

We would also like to see the Government take on board the recommendations from the Prime Minister's Better Regulation Task Force report and implement them fully.

One issue, which the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford raised earlier, is that, although we recognise that the Government are making an attempt to tackle over-regulation with the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, it goes too far. Some Members have nicknamed it the Abolition of Parliament Bill, which is not inappropriate. In practice, it would move powers to amend legislation in almost any area from Parliament to Ministers. Although everyone agrees with the aims of the exercise, as was shown by the fact that the Bill was passed on Second Reading with no opposition, the Government's proposals have been disproportionate. It would be a shame if the valid intention of deregulation was derailed by the Government's trying to take too much power away from Parliament. I hope that when the Bill returns to the Floor of the House, it is returned to its original intentions and does not overstep the mark so much.

The grocery battle is exercising many people at the moment, as has already been mentioned. I have received letters from a number of keepers of small shops—as I am sure all hon. Members have—including one from the managers of every single Spar store in my constituency, which raises their concerns about the possible increase in Sunday trading hours for supermarkets. They are worried about the impact that that will have on their businesses and their ability to stay afloat.

The power of the supermarkets is having a huge impact not only on other retailers but on small businesses across the country that produce and process food, such as businesses in the agriculture sector, abattoirs, small-scale processors and so on. That is a worrying development. I would like to see a better balance between small and large businesses. It is not in the interest of our communities to allow small retailers, processors and producers to be squeezed out by much larger businesses—the balance between the two needs to be right.

As has already been mentioned, smaller retailers, such as Spar and other convenience stores, play a crucial role in our communities that should not be underestimated. My constituency is a mix of inner-city urban areas and suburban ones, and for those with mobility problems and the elderly, such shops are much easier to get to than out-of-town superstores. They are a very important part of those people's lives. In rural areas, such as the one where my parents live, there are large supermarkets, but they may be an extremely long way away from where people live. Local shops and convenience stores are the heart of the local community, and if they are put out of business, that could have a devastating impact. Because of their economic role, the important social function that they fulfil must be protected.

We would like the Government to introduce more proactive measures to tackle the current situation. Deregulation and lifting the burden of paperwork would be a good start, but as the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford said, we would like the Competition Commission to investigate all the issues fully. We would like more and better use to be made of the existing set-up at the Office of Fair Trading, which could consider the issues proactively.

In the long-run, the Lib Dems would like an independent ombudsman to be created, to take up complaints confidentially and hold inquiries into market fixing, supermarket supply chains and so on, so that smaller producers and retailers do not have to put their neck on the block. There is a lot of evidence that the businesses of people who complain publicly end up having major problems afterwards. Therefore, we would like there to be a confidential route by which people can complain so that investigations can be carried out.

Please do not take my words as being anti-big business. Big businesses play a crucial, although different, role in our societies. Without the jobs, investment, services and products that they provide, our economy would grind to a halt. Large businesses ensure that we have a vibrant and flourishing economy and the Government need to work through all Departments to ensure that those businesses have the well-educated and healthy work force that they need to keep operating.

I represent an inner-city seat and there are a large number of big enterprises in my constituency. They contribute a massive amount to the life of the city, in terms of jobs and financial impact, but also by their charitable and social involvement. Several of them involve their work force in local projects: they work with local charities and make many financial donations to local organisations. There are some very interesting examples of work in local schools. For example, bank employees will spend an hour during their lunch break once a week to help children learn to read in schools.

A big impact can be made by employers who are open-minded and take on board their wider social responsibilities by getting involved in the local community. That is definitely to be encouraged. That is one of the reasons why the Lib Dems were so supportive of the requirement for an operating and financial review of listed companies, which we felt was an example of good regulation. As hon. Members will know, most listed companies already produce this information informally—a lot of companies provide it as part of their commitment to corporate social responsibility—and the proposals were widely welcomed at the time.

Operating and Financial Reviews are a good way to ensure that businesses consider and account for the social, ethical, community and environmental impact of their operations. In an increasingly global economy, it is a question not just of the impact that businesses have in the UK but of their broader impact wherever they operate in the world. We support the reduction of the regulatory burden on business, but that should not be done by chucking out good regulation before it is introduced. It should be done by getting rid of over-regulation and bad regulation.

Alun Michael: The hon. Lady has probably not had the opportunity to see how we are responding to the consultation that took place as a result of the decision to remove the OFR requirement—and thus the duplication and cost involved in that process. We did so precisely for the reasons that she mentions. We want to ensure that there is better narrative reporting, without placing an excessive burden on industry. Many of the things that she wants to encourage are not prevented by the change. It is a question of making sure that best practice is encouraged and that an excessive burden is not placed on business. That idea underlies the amendments to the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill that will be discussed in another place before it returns to this House.

Jenny Willott: Much of that is indeed the case, but my concern is that companies that already operate best practice, which are very involved and take on their responsibilities, already account for themselves and provide annual reporting. The companies that might have slightly less to boast about might not do so if they are not required to account for their activities,. I am optimistic that something good may come out of the process currently under way.

Governments do not have a great track record in creating wealth directly. The role of the Government should be to ensure competition, encourage corporate social responsibility and create an economic and regulatory climate that enables enterprise to flourish—a supportive role, in other words. Heavy-handed, interfering government can make it difficult for business, especially small business, to create the wealth that is important for the health of our economy and our communities. We need to get rid of swathes of unnecessary regulation, provide support for small businesses to flourish and grow, and enable big businesses to operate in a healthy economic environment with an appropriately skilled work force, so that they can play a full part in the communities in which they are based and are supported in that. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

3.39 pm

Alun Michael: I thank the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) and my neighbour, the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Jenny Willott), for their constructive contributions to the discussion. Some of the things that they said were challenging to the Government, which is entirely right.

I entirely agree with the point about the role of Government with which the hon. Lady concluded her remarks. Our role is to work with business and nurture enterprise, rather than to take a top-down domineering approach in which we assume that we can do everything ourselves. It is clear that we need to create the right environment. As the hon. Gentleman said, we have the ambition to make this country the best place to do business, and we have made considerable progress with that aspiration.

Both hon. Members referred to regulation. I recognise that reducing regulation and cutting down the strands of OFRs are difficult challenges for the Government. In terms of regulation, one must consider the instinct not only of the Government but of Parliament. Whenever a problem appears, the instinct of Members from all parties is to demand that Parliament deal with the issue. We need to be careful of that. I am fond of quoting Gibbon's remark in "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire":

> "Laws cannot always prevent what they forbid."

My philosophy and that of the Government is to consider where we can work with business to find the right response to a problem, and to ask ourselves whether it needs legislation, a new organisation, a new requirement, or whether there are more intelligent ways of dealing with it.

[Alun Michael]

I can point to a couple of examples from my own experience. The Gangmasters (Licensing) Act 2004 was a response to what all parties agreed was a human tragedy. The practice had existed in many rural communities for many years, but it was brought to public prominence and attention by the events in Morecambe bay. The legislation was designed in conjunction with all sides of industry, and industry representatives now sit on the agency that was created to implement the 2004 Act. It is a good example of co-operative legislation.

Another stunning example concerns something that all Members abhor: internet child pornography—or child abuse, because behind every example of child pornography is an example of actual abuse. It has been acknowledged that we have achieved more in a year or so without legislation than we could have achieved in five years with legislation. The reason is that people in industry, who for a long time said, "It's impossible to regulate this issue effectively," sat down with the Government, child protection agencies, children's charities, the police to find a way of cutting off access to the more horrific sites. I underline the engagement of business in that process.

There are plenty of other examples, but Members from all parties must acknowledge that the temptation is always to add to the burden of regulation as soon as something goes wrong. It may be that a small percentage of business is engaged in an activity that causes problems. Our question is, can we deal with, let us say, the 10 per cent. of people who are doing the wrong thing, without creating a bureaucracy that imposes on others? The challenge to all of us as parliamentarians is to bear that in mind, as well as to tackle the mischief that our constituents bring to our attention.

Mr. Prisk: The Minister mentioned Gibbon; I might mention Henry VIII. Although I entirely accept that the cry of "something must be done" habitually echoes throughout the House, and that Westminster must therefore have a role, the source of regulations is Government, whether UK or European. Given that, will the right hon. Gentleman explain why regulation has risen by more than 50 per cent. annually since 1997?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman seeks to place all responsibility on the Government. Often, the pressure comes from parliamentarians and, behind them, constituents to deal with a particular mischief. I invite him to consider the number of calls for legislation that Members of Parliament make, and the number of early-day motions that call for legislative action. They are far in excess of the amount of regulation and legislation that we have introduced. I do not say that in a partisan way. It is almost human nature, and it is the nature of the environment that has developed in Parliament over many years.

Both hon. Members are right to challenge the Government about their performance in reducing regulation, but all parliamentarians have a collective responsibility to create a different, more engaged environment in which we consider the best ways of dealing with the mischief without providing the burden. That more holistic approach should commend itself to us all.

In my opening speech I said that the UK has great enterprise potential, but I acknowledged that all is not yet well. In spite of our potential, entrepreneurial activity in the UK remains lower than in some of our G7 competitors, and we have almost 50 per cent. less entrepreneurial activity as a proportion of the population than the United States. I referred to the statistics for women's enterprise. There is a significant challenge in closing that enterprise gap between ourselves and our competitors.

The Government can find figures that point to the good things, and the Opposition can find those that point to the bad things or the failures in what we set out to do. So rather than bandy about figures, we should work together to try to improve performance and target the right improvements. That has been the atmosphere of today's debate: it has had quality, if not quantity. It is in all our interests that the economy succeeds and entrepreneurship grows.

On the positive side, the UK economy is strong. Employment has increased by more than 2.3 million since 1997. Inflation is low and stable, and interest rates remain low by historical standards. In the period since 1997, GDP growth in the UK has been more stable than in any other G7 country. By contrast, between 1979 and 1996, growth in the UK was the most volatile in the G7, with the exception of Canada. We must work together to ensure that we make the most of the stable situation, and ensure that it continues for the long term.

Comparisons are sometimes made between ourselves and our European colleagues—or friends, neighbours or competitors, depending on which relationship one favours most—and it is sometimes suggested that we do not perform to the best of our ability. However, unemployment is below the EU average and redundancies are at an all-time low. The employment rate in France is 63.1 per cent. on 2004 figures, compared with almost 75 per cent. in the UK. The unemployment rate in France is 9.3 per cent. compared with 5.1 per cent. in the UK. While we consider the plusses and minuses, of which there are always some in any comparison, we should bear in mind that overarching strategic position.

Mr. Prisk: I understand the Minister's point, but I wish that our ambition was greater than to be better than the French economy, and more positive than to try to surpass our friends in Italy. They are going through dreadful problems, and they need to wake up and realise that the world does not owe them a living any more than it does us. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that to aim simply to compare ourselves with our European neighbours is to sell this country short? We should be focused on competing with nations throughout the globe—China, India, America and Japan. Should not that be our ambition?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman might have the generosity to acknowledge that the comparison I made about enterprise activity generally and about women's activity was with the United States of America, because I said that we ought to aspire to reach those levels. In relation to China, India, Korea and a variety of other countries, I have said on several occasions that our ambition must be not to worry or to treat them as people who will undermine our economy because they operate at a low pay level and can therefore undercut us, but to compete on the basis of quality. We should recognise that China and India aspire to compete with us on research and development—high output activity—and that should not be seen as a threat. China, with its fourfold growth over 20 years, presents us with an enormous opportunity as well as a challenge. I hope that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges that the Government's level of aspiration is almost boundless, and certainly as high as he would wish.

I turn now to manufacturing. It is sometimes said that it has slid down the order of priorities in this country, but it certainly has not as far as the Government are concerned. It is true that manufacturing has been declining as a percentage of gross domestic product, but it still accounts for one sixth of our national output. It produces more than half of our exports and employs more than 3 million people—that is far from insignificant. Because manufacturing has such an important role in the UK economy, it is important that the Government's manufacturing strategy is monitored and driven forward effectively—those activities will benefit from the interest and engagement of Opposition Members—and that is why we formed the manufacturing forum in December 2004.

The forum predates my current role as the Minister for Industry and the Regions, but, frankly, I have found my engagement with it exciting. It is jointly chaired by Kevin Smith, the chief executive of GKN, and me, and it brings together representatives from industry, the trade unions, academia, regional development agencies and organisations such as the Engineering Employers Federation and the CBI.

In its first year, the forum focused on three priority areas: skills, image and public procurement. It has stimulated new actions, including the development of a national manufacturing skills academy, which will be of enormous importance across a range of manufacturing industries in the future, and the proposal for a manufacturing media centre, which will ensure that accurate information is provided about what is being done by manufacturing businesses. The forum is about to establish a working group to look at barriers to investment, which is also an important issue for manufacturing companies.

On the stimulation of enterprise, this year I asked Enterprise Insight to develop a significant manufacturing element in the "make your mark" campaign. There will be a manufacturing day during enterprise week, and the forum will support this important opportunity effectively to engage young people in modern manufacturing. I have had very positive responses from large businesses such as European Aeronautic Defence and Space Company and from the CBI. The current approach is to find existing initiatives that work with schools and industries throughout the year so that Enterprise Insight can support, expand and showcase them.

However, the enterprise gap between us and our competitors is not our only concern. There are significant differences in the rates of enterprise across and within our own regions, and that is also something that we must tackle. Based on my experience in both regeneration and enterprise development at a local level, I strongly believe that the two are closely related. We cannot have social regeneration without economic development, and we cannot have economic development without social regeneration that involves the community and its aspirations.

Therefore, to promote enterprise and jobs in deprived areas, we launched the local enterprise growth initiative, which is jointly supported by the Department of Trade and Industry, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Treasury. My hon. Friends the Minister for Local Government and the Financial Secretary share my vision that enterprise can be used as a tool to tackle deprivation, as well as being worth while in itself, and the objectives of wealth creation that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford rightly underlined in his remarks.

The local enterprise growth initiative, or LEGI, as it is becoming known—I do not do acronyms, but I suspect that that one will stick—will be worth £50 million in 2006–07. It has the principal aim of releasing the economic and productivity potential of our most deprived local areas through enterprise and investment. The funds will be channelled through the economic development and enterprise block in local area agreements and will be linked with the work of local authorities and their partners. The programme provides an opportunity for complementary funding for successful bids that reach across to other policy areas.

The emphasis in developing LEGI has been on quality. We ran a process that engaged private sector partners to choose those bids that appeared to have a real prospect of making transformational change and of stimulating enterprise. The best of the bids were excellent and will make a real difference in some of the lowest performing local economies in the country, but we want to go a step further. We want the money to make a real difference by showing how to achieve real change. If the team in an area that has low enterprise activity failed to produce a high-quality bid, it could be evidence of a double whammy of low economic activity and low-quality strategic thinking or leadership, which could trap a community at the bottom of the pile. Therefore, we will put even more effort into challenging and helping some unsuccessful local teams to lift their game in the next round of LEGI bids, and we will do that with a great sense of urgency.

The Government are serious about real change being effected in the most deprived areas, and about the part that enterprise can play in that. LEGI has the potential to be a vital element in regeneration and increasing business activity, but we want to avoid duplication and to pursue simplification—or de-proliferation, as the hon. Gentleman rightly termed it earlier. There are too many strands of business support duplicating each other's work, so we do not want LEGI to make matters worse. There must be one front door on which people knock to get help in starting or growing a business. Business Link, with the support of the regional development agency, must be at the heart of local initiatives.

The importance of enterprise should not be underestimated. Whether it is the formation of new businesses, the expansion of existing ones or attracting businesses to an area, enterprise is a key driver of the economy. I referred to the fact that small and medium-sized enterprises employ more than 50 per cent. of our private-sector work force. They account for more than £1 trillion of private-sector turnover each year. But of course it is the potential for growth of those businesses, as well as replication, that is essential for long-term success.

Mr. Prisk: I listened with interest to the information about the initiative to which the Minister referred. When does its funding stop? Is it next April or the April afterwards?

Alun Michael: No, we are planning a three-year programme of funding—there will be continuity in it.

LEGI is also an opportunity for regional development agencies and local government to focus on the areas that perform least well in enterprise activity to see how they can be lifted. The lessons that come out of LEGI will be significant for local authorities' civic leadership in the economy and for regional development as well as for business partners. As with the work on encouraging enterprise activity and ambition among young people, there will be lessons learned that we will expect to roll out much more widely as time goes on.

Both hon. Members made specific comments that were quite significant. The hon. Gentleman underlined the importance of enterprise in generating wealth, and I agree with him entirely. Indeed, my first point was that without economic prosperity and the creation of wealth, there will not be jobs, and without jobs there will not be local prosperity. There is no difference between us on that.

The hon. Gentleman also said that many company directors believe that it is harder to run a business. I suspect that that is true. It is a tough climate for business, and that is caused not just by Government regulation but by the amount of competition faced by businesses of all sizes. We are going through a period of intense change and major global competition, to which he referred. I believe that the Government have done more than he acknowledged to strip away regulation and relieve regulatory burdens. We have exempted nearly 900,000 companies from audit requirements on their accounts by raising the annual turnover threshold from £1 million to £5.6 million. That saves companies at least £94 million a year. We have provided the highest VAT threshold in Europe: from 1 April 2006, firms with a turnover of £61,000 or less do not have to register for or pay VAT. We have reduced payroll burdens for 1.2 million businesses, and there has been £300 million-worth of savings for businesses through reforms to tax administration in the 2005 pre-Budget report.

Efforts are being made to speed up the planning system. The introduction of financial incentives for SMEs to file payroll returns online has benefits for the Government and businesses. A new, simplified self-assessment return for those whose affairs are simple—for example, self-employed people with a turnover of less than £15,000 as well as employees and pensioners—is being developed. Forty pieces of out-of-date excise duty legislation were withdrawn or simplified on 1 March 2006. It is important to provide clearer information for businesses on regulatory changes and we have set up the www.businesslink.gov.uk website to help SMEs to find out how regulations apply to them and to engage with businesses and, through that, to link with the Supply2.gov.uk portal to simplify the opportunities for SMEs.

I am not suggesting that everything in the garden is wonderful. There is a lot of work to do and both hon. Members referred to some of the things that we need to do, but I hope that it is clear from that list that significant developments have continued to remove burdens on small businesses. We will certainly continue to work on de-proliferation and I am glad that we shall have the support of the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford when trying to deal with the many strands of support that have been built up by successive Governments. I know from my experience at DEFRA that it is not easy to tackle those issues, but it is worth trying.

The hon. Gentleman asked which current schemes are under-performing and which should be scrapped, but he missed out those that should be combined. In some cases it would be possible to combine a number of different strands in a broader strand so that people can receive a more flexible response. In the longer term, there will be enlightenment on some of the issues that he raised as a result of the comprehensive spending review, which is considering how to lighten the burden of regulation as well as looking at where the benefits are greatest.

I am happy to respond positively to the hon. Gentleman's request to keep the House informed about the progress of the women's enterprise taskforce. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Women and Equality will be enthusiastic about doing so. The hon. Gentleman referred to failures; that is a matter of deciding whether the glass is half full or half empty. Almost 1 million women are self-employed, which is up 10 per cent. over the past four years. Of newly self-employed people, 36 per cent. are women compared with 27 per cent. of the currently self-employed. There is a particularly high increase in female entrepreneurial activity in the east of England, Scotland and the south-west, and we must look at why that is happening in some regions and not all. It is difficult to provide figures, but many women seem to be taking leadership roles in social enterprises. That may be due to a more value-driven approach and the link between that and their approach to family and community. That contribution can be valuable.

Over the past year I have found it inspiring that many business leaders are willing to try to inspire others. I have referred to Kevin Smith of GKN, Duncan Mitchell of Cisco and other senior people who have engaged with the information age partnership. It is essential that that area grows if we are to achieve the levels of productivity that all hon. Members in the Chamber aspire to. Roger Putnam of Ford is putting in time to improve the quality and reputation of the supply side of the motor industry. Those businesses and others have worked with us on the company law reform agenda and the "think small first" philosophy which is built into that.

Business leaders in the construction industry have been working on the TrustMark scheme to try to provide assurance for consumers as well as a level playing field of a higher quality within the industry. We have also seen business leadership among the chairs of the regional development agencies.

The hon. Gentleman referred to home as the place in which to start a business. He is right, but that should be balanced with the mutual stimulus and shared learning that is available when individuals who are starting up in business work together in nursery facilities.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the effect of crime on the retail industry. I sponsored the shopfront security group in the House of Commons when we tried to persuade a Conservative Government to take the issue seriously, and I welcome his comments. There are schemes such as the crime reduction partnership under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and police community support officers, who often engage with retail businesses, particularly on estates, and in smaller shopping areas and smaller towns. The Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005 was another of my babies and provides support for local authorities in partnership with business. I can also claim parentage of antisocial behaviour orders. All are important in helping business in relation to the crime that is a challenge to them. It was interesting that that was a topic, with healthy eating, at the Retail Consortium's parliamentary event which I attended in the House only last week.

Mr. Prisk: Given the Minister's interest and experience in the effect of crime on businesses, does he believe that it is wrong for police authorities and forces not to include business crime in their statistics? Inevitably, the targets that they are chasing exclude that, which will make business crime a secondary matter. Does he agree that many businesses would gain confidence, given what they pay to those authorities in taxes, to see business crime given the same level of priority and made a target?

Alun Michael: I am not going to enter into the Home Office's area of responsibility in measuring crime. However, I know that my colleagues in the Home Office have placed great emphasis on tackling crime in our high streets and its impact on businesses. That is why it was such an interesting topic of conversation. If the hon. Gentleman had heard the contribution from the assistant commissioner last week he would have had no doubt that it is high on the agenda of the Metropolitan police to work in partnership with industry and the wider community to reduce the impact of crime on the retail trade.

We have had an interesting and constructive debate and I hope that I have managed to address at least some of the issues that were raised by hon. Members. I will examine the record to see whether I left out anything and will, as I promised, provide information to all hon. Members present on the couple of points that I could not answer.

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford offered to commend the Government when we get things right. I welcome that balanced approach, which will keep him very busy.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes past Four o'clock.
